Bray Mutual Meeting

Annual meeting of the Bray Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and election of officers for the coming year, was held here yesterday afternoon at the Young & Olsen hall. There was a good representation of policyholders present from this vicinity as well as outlaying districts. According to the annual report, which will be published in an early issue, the company has enjoyed a fine business as well as substantial growth the past year, and now carries some four millions of insurance. As losses have been more frequent than usual during the past year, it is considered likely an assessment may be levied soon to build up the necessary reserve. In all and all, the company is in fine condition.

That the officers are conducting affairs to satisfaction of all interested, is attested by the fact that all present officials were re-elected without opposition.

Birthday Party

Mr. and Mrs. Otto Johnson entertained a number of relatives and friends at a dinner party at their home last Sunday in honor of Mrs. Johnson's cousin, Andrew Hauge's birthday anniversary. Those present were Andrew Hauge honor guest, Mr. and Mrs. Ed Hauske, Mr. and Mrs. Martin Finstad, Mrs. L. Finstad and Walter Iverson of Rocksbury, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Engen of Newfolden, Miss Agnes Hallameck of Sioux Falls, S. D., Mr. and Mrs. E. Hallameck and daughter Mollie, and Mrs. R. L. Hauge.

After spending Christmas week here, Miss Huldah Gigstad left Saturday for a visit with her cousin, Miss Emma Narveson, at Crookston before returning to her work as instructor in the city schools at Moorhead.

Marlyn and Doloris Hauge came up Saturday from Bemidji and are visiting at the M. H. Jackson and Norman Bergh homes and with other relatives.

A New Years Wake and program was given by the Luther League at the Norwegian Lutheran church parlors Monday night.

Another fall of snow last Friday has given this section sufficient so there is now good sleighing.

Birthday Club Parties

Members of the Birthday Club have had two very enjoyable parties the past week. On Friday they were entertained at the Gigstad home by Miss Huldah Gigstad and spent a delightful afternoon. On New Year's Eve, members and their husbands enjoyed a wake and had a midnight luncheon at the O. Gunstad home with Messers and Mesdames N. E. Beebe, J. A. Hansen, L. E. Beebe and O. Gunstad as hosts and hostesses.

Dixon--Weborg

"A very beautiful wedding was solemized at high noon Tuesday, December 11th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dixon at Bancroft, when their daughter, Florabell, became the bride of Kenneth Weborg, son of Mr. and Mrs. George C. Weborg of Pender. The Rev. Einar Anderson, pastor of the Swedish Mission church of Pender, read the marriage lines".

The above from a Nebraska newspaper, will be of interest to many people here as the groom spent his boyhood days in St. Hilaire. His mother, formerly Tyra Wallen, will be recalled by many local people.

In reviewing events of a year ago, we find one of our local young men was missing for several days at that time. Since he later returned safe and sound, no other mention will be made. Another of our young men duplicated the performance this year, and we hope to be able to chronicle something more in connection therewith, later on.

Fire last week did some damage to the farm residence occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Brue Peters, northeast of Thief River Falls. Fortunately, the blaze was extinguished before any serious damage occured.

Annual meeting of the county board of commissioners will be held at Thief River Falls next Tuesday, Jan 8. A large number of applications for old age pensions will be acted upon at this meeting.

Northern Minnesota certainly has some variations in temperature this winter. As much as 44 degrees difference has been noted within a 24 hour period.

It's a bit hard to write 1935 at first, but it's a good thing one has twelve months in which to practice it.

Production Credit Meet

Members of the Thief River Falls Production Credit Association will meet at 10:30 A. M., Jan. 8, 1935, at the court rooms in the court house at Thief River for its first annual meeting. This is one of 12 similar associations organized by farmers in this state under the Farm Credit Administration to provide a source of funds for putting in crops, to purchase livestock, feed, equipment, and for general farm purposes. Since formed in 1934 the association has gained 155 members and has made loans totaling $41,454. Every borrower is entitled to one vote at the election of officers which occurs Jan. 8th. A representative of the Production Credit Corporation of St. Paul will attend the meeting and address stockholders, and there will be reports, etc., that will require action by the stockholders. Farmers who are not stockholders, are invited to attend the meeting. The organization of production credit associations is one of the steps in behalf of agriculture that farmers have long contended for, that is a chance to obtain credit at low rates on reasonable terms for their current or seasonable farm needs. The organization is on permanent basis and is not a temporary or emergency setup.

At the meeting Jan. 8th, 5 directors will be elected to serve for 1, 2, and 3 years. All directors chosen hereafter will be for three year terms. The association has members in Pennington, Red Lake, Roseau, eastern Marshall, Lake of the Woods and northern Beltrami counties.

Judge Tarrant Is Dead

Funeral services were held yesterday morning at 9 o'clock at Thief River Falls for the late Municipal Judge N. W. Tarrant who died at his home in that city Monday. Mr. Tarrant, who had held various public offices since he first came to this section about forty years ago, was well known all thruout this section of the state and had the respect and esteem of all who knew him. He had served as judge of the municipal court at Thief River Falls for about twenty years.

Friends here have received word that Gorden Martz, former local man, was married recently in the Twin Cities. No other information is available at this time. Gorden has a host of friends here who will join in extending congratulations.

Fires At Thief River

The service station and tire shop building located on the corner south of the public library at Thief River Falls was badly damaged by fire which started at noon last Friday. The fire started between walls of the building which had stucco finished outside and steel sheeting inside, making it very difficult for firemen to reach the blaze. After burning several hours, the fire broke thru the roof and was extinguished from that point. Later that day, firemen were called to the Pennington County Fair grounds to fight a blaze which destroyed three buildings. A quantity of hay and seed had been stored in the barns, and it is believed that the blaze started by spontaneous combustion. Some insurance was carried on both the service station and fair ground buildings, and the hay and seed in the latter is reported to be partially covered.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

Chinese Official Sells Right to Print Money

A novel method of raising money is reported by a southern correspondent on the basis of tidings from Hamkang, Henghua, says the United Press.

There the magistrate, if this tale is correct, will permit a shop, or other business concern, to print its own banknotes if 100 silver dollars are first handed over to the magistrate.

All comers are accommodated, so long as they have 100 silver dollars to put on the line. Most firms are allowed to put out unlimited amounts, in all denominations, with no question of backing.

In order to support his clients, the magistrate threatens the death penalty in the event that anyone refuses to accept any note issue. One merchant tested the decree. His head now decorates the city gate.

JAPANESE GENTLEMEN SHY OFF AT DENIALS

If one were to put in straight English the Japanese judgment (or, for that matter, the Chinese or the Hindu) of what Occidentals call honesty, sincerity and candor, writes Sir Frederick Whyte in the Atlantic Magazine, one would find it approximate to the saying. "One can be truthful only with one's equals; with those who have not his whole respect the wise man is merely polite."

In any controversy, particularly of a personal nature, Westerners are in the habit of saying: "Let's go and have it out with him; that will clear the air and then we can get down to business." But this rough and ready method of candid exchange finds little or no place in the habits of Asia.

It is hardly an exaggeration to say that it is a social crime in Japan to give, in answer to a question, any reply (however true), which may displease or to ask for any favor which will make necessary a blunt refusal. Among certain peoples the messenger of evil was rewarded with death; in Japan, unless he conveys his message with suitable circumlocutions, he is likely to be ostracized as a barbarian. Blunt negatives and direct refusals are, in fact, unknown to the code of the Japanese, and in order to convey such notions one must speak circuitously, casting hints of one's meaning here and there, half indicating one thing while ostensibly affirming the opposite.

SOMEONE'S DEAREST CARY

By COSMO HAMILTON

©, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service

THE cigarette case with which he had been playing was a gold one, battered and none too clean. It might have been used as a missile in moments of boredom during such a tea party as this one, for instance, but undoubtedly it was gold. Apart from the dents which gave it a history of carelessness or temper it was dedicated in a man's handwriting to "Dearest Cary—with everlasting love." It was this engraved inscription, so amazingly indiscreet, which made Balfour turn to the girl on his left. Balfour was given to playing hermit in his stronghold on the hill; his somewhat infrequent novels were numbered among events. Tall, thin, grayish, immaculate, unmarried, he was as aloof as a cuckoo, but when he came forth, bland, patient and heroic, he played the social game with ability, and hoped, in spite of cynicism, for a little fun. It was his hobby to laugh.

"Are you Cary?" he asked.

"Yes, worse luck," she said.

She was pretty, with splendid shoulders, thoroughbred, or, as it amused him to put it, gold. Somewhat battered, however, he was bound to confess, like the case. She, too, had the appearance of one who had been used, or had used herself, as a missile, because her edges had been dented and there was irony round her mouth. It was a pity and he was sorry. His psychological eye read quite easily in her face and in her nicotine-stained fingers and slightly out-of-date frock a history as dented as the cigarette case which had been pushed beneath his hand.

"Why worse luck?" he asked. She would lie as all girls lied, and every woman, according to her creed.

"Because I hate myself," she said simply. "However, would you like to buy a cigarette case? It's gold. You can have the dents pushed out."

"Buy it? But what would the man say who wrote 'Dearest Cary—with everlasting love'?"

"He wouldn't know," she said. "He works in Shanghai, you see. I intended to go to town to hock the poor little thing. I can raise enough money on it to buy the only things which keep me from taking rat poison—cigarettes, I mean."

"You're lying, my child," he said.

"I never lie," she answered. "That's why not a single soul believes a word I say. I've pushed this thing under your hand so that you might ask me about it and having heard the truth play the gallant person and save me going to town."

He considered that some one's dearest Cary was dramatizing herself, was using her cigarette case for the purpose of achieving limelight. However, there were the possibilities of amusement in all this. He might add another laugh to his collection, which was good. "How much do you want?" he asked.

"Five dollars is the usual sum," she said.

"If you will throw in the dents and tell me what put them there I'll double the price—though I shan't believe a word."

Upon which, quite briefly, she told him that she was engaged to be married to a Harvard man who worked in Shanghai for his firm. There was everlasting love on both sides, but she was twenty-seven, and there was no hope of their marriage because his salary was low. Her father and mother were dead and for several years she had been living with a disagreeable aunt. "Like Micawber I am hanging about waiting for something to turn up, afraid to take the bull by the horns and strike out for myself—which answers the unpleasant questions I can see in the back of your eyes. . . If you would rather that a poor but honest girl who is badly up against it continues to grace this world why not give me a job? In fact—and this is a brain-wave. . ."

"I thought that was coming," said Balfour. "But I have a secretary, as it happens, a very capable girl."

"How long has she been with you?" he asked.

"Five years next Christmas," he said.

"Ah. Then I should think she's about fed up. It must be terribly monotonous to have been with you so long. I think that lets me in. Put me next on your list. I will take up stenography and typewriting tomorrow and work like a little dog and report at the turn of the year. I know the name of your house here. It's very nice, I'm told."

Balfour laughed it off. He put this girl down as an exhibitionist and dismissed her from his mind. But he kept the case as a memento with its very numerous dents. After all, it was gold.

For five years, with an annual holiday which she made too short, Balfour's capable secretary had kept her lamp of loyalty blazing on his roof. The tumult in her soul which had been caused by her love for this aloof, distinguished man had gradually died away. So that Doris Minton was a very happy girl. Except, that is, for the haunting fear that one day he would announce his engagement to some impossible person who would ruin the rest of his life. Just at the moment, however, when the sky was even more cloudless than it had ever been, dearest Cary made an energetic entrance into that house on the hill. She was carrying a portable typewriter in one hand, a vanity case in the other and was followed by a taxi driver bearing several bags. Hearing a cheery "Hullo" followed by "Here I am," Doris became covered with goose-flesh and stood frozen to the floor.

"Don't we shake hands?" asked Cary, extremely proud of herself. "I said I'd be here and I am here, exactly at the turn of the year. How soon can we get to work?"

Balfour remembered her and was bound to confess, and gladly, that if ever he had seen a girl in her second blooming he saw her in dearest Cary who belonged to the man in Shanghai. "This is going to be the most awkward thing," he said, "that has ever happened to me." But the sentiment in his nature drove the cynicism out. "I can see that this means at least twice as much work for me. Miss Minton in the morning and you in the afternoon. But I think that you had better meet as infrequently as you can."

"Perfectly fine," she said.

Doris and dearest Cary remained on speaking terms—and what could be worse than that? They spoke to each other in cutting words and hurled metaphorical bombs. Balfour's life, like that of a traffic policeman, was a far from happy one. He commenced that curious practice, before the end of a month, of concocting imaginary telegrams which should call him to New York. Some one had got to die. His house was no longer a home. It was a front-line trench. And yet, as the book had to be finished by a certain date, what was he to do? Should he beat a quick retreat, engage another secretary and continue to work in New York? Or might he get out of this trouble by an offer of marriage to one of the girls and the retention of the other to type? There was a huge dent in his case—especially when he discovered that he was deeply in love with Cary, who was undoubtedly gold. It was on the tip of his tongue to say to her, "I find that I'm in love for the first time in my life. I'm ready to drop my selfish habits, my cynicism and egotism and lay every decent thing that's in me at your feet." But was it decent to take advantage of the man who worked in Shanghai? He didn't think that it was.

It was true that Christmas was over and that the time for making presents had therefore slipped away, but one night after dinner he took Cary by the elbow and led her in his room. Doris remained at the radio, but although it was a symphony orchestra she never heard a sound. He said in his most cynical manner, "I want you to listen to this. I'm dead against long engagements. They make so many dents. As Christmas is not so far behind I'm going to ask you to accept a present which, if you'd been here, I might have given you then."

"What on earth do you mean?"

With the merest suggestion of a stammer he came up to the scratch. "Pocket this envelope, will you? It contains a little check. I want you to buy some frocks with it, book yourself a passage to the man who lives in Shanghai, and, after having had a honeymoon in some romantic place—they're always to be found—settle down and live happily ever after, as I firmly believe you will."

Cary took the envelope and, as it was rather dark, put it to her lips. "You're the only living person," she said, "with the gift of finding the sort of words that are proper to a thing like this."

And when he felt her hand on his arm he trembled in every limb. She was utterly wrong, as it happened. He had lost that gift just then.

"So you think I'm a rotten secretary and you're giving me the push?"

"No," he said. "You're an excellent secretary, my dearest Cary, but you'll make a better wife. Then, too, to be perfectly honest, I'm thinking about Miss Minton and her faithful excellence."

"Who's the liar now?"

"I am." He raised her hand to his lips. "But let me give you a tip. Remind the man who lives in Shanghai that, round about Christmas time, a somewhat elderly novelist may do little things like this."

A wireless came from the ship. "God bless you, my dear friend."

Well, three young people were happy—Doris was still quite young, and so was the man in Shanghai—and Balfour, after all, would soon be fifty-one.

Oh, yes, he kept the case.

Negroes Roam Caucasus, Report From Travelers

Following the recent discovery in the fastnesses of the Altai mountains of a tribe of hitherto unknown hillmen who claim never to have heard of either the World war or the Russian revolution, comes the report that a Soviet expedition has stumbled on a village in the wildest and most remote part of the Caucasus, whose inhabitants are all negroes. It is considered probable that they are the descendants of negro slaves, which the Georgian nobles were in the habit of buying in the slave markets of Stamboul. Their presence in the Caucasus may be due to the fact of one of the ancient galleons having foundered on the shores of the Black sea, some slaves escaping to found the present black colony.—Montreal Herald.

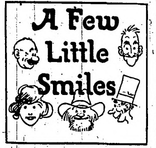
A Few Little Smiles



HANDY

Brown's wife was musical. She had other faults as well. But Brown was a good husband, and when she showed a desire to learn the violin he promised to make her a present of one.

"A violin for your wife?" said the assistant at the music shop. "Certainly, sir. One with a chin rest?"

"Yes," said Brown. Then, as a brilliant idea came to him, he hurried after the assistant and caught him by the sleeve. "Make it a detachable chin rest," he said, "so that she can still use it when she is not playing the violin."—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Dead Long Ago

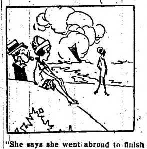
The office quip, looking about for excitement, stopped to gaze on the walkathon "ad" which beckoned: "Come and see the dying gladiators."

"That's it," she exclaimed to her associates. "That ought to give me a thrill. Guess I'll look in on them tonight." And she did.

The next morning, when a lull came in the busy routine, Sadie leaned over her desk and asked:

"I say, kid, did you see the dying gladiolas last night?"

THAT'S SOMETHING



"She says she went abroad to finish her education. I wonder if she learned much?"

"She told me she had six new ways to fix her hair."

Matter of Names

Some members of a farming community were listening to a political speaker.

"What is agriculture?" he exclaimed. "What is agriculture that it should be ignored: that it should be scorned?" He paused dramatically. "Again, I repeat, what is agriculture?"

"Well," called out a voice from the rear of the room, "I always thought it was just farmin' dressed up a little."

Discoveries

"Archeologists have found some wonderful things in buried cities!" said the professor.

"Yes," answered Miss Cayenne, "but they find no traces of telephones or electric lights or locomotives."

"Yet their discoveries are most important."

"Of course. They help to explain how the old towns happened to be buried."

"They're Off"

"I like your uncle," exclaimed one girl to her chum. "He is such a sporty old man!"

"Yes, but he's a little too sporty at times," remarked her friend. "For instance, the other Sunday he fell asleep in church, and when I nudged him he yawned, stared at the hymn board, and cried out so loudly that everybody must have heard him, 'Good gracious, only three starters!'"

DOG TEAM "POWER" OPERATES TRAMWAY

Thoughts of a dog team in the Canadian Far North country, writes Bert Stoll in the Detroit News, usually brings to mind a team of huskies swinging over a snow-covered trail pulling a sledgeload of furs or supplies, while their driver "mushes" along ahead on his snowshoes, breaking trail, or, if the trail is fairly well packed, riding on the rear of the runners while his sturdy team pulls him steadily toward his cabin.

But there is one dog team in the North country that sees another type of service during the summertime. They furnish the "power" to operate a miniature tramway for a trapper in this area.

The ingenious trapper, a former engineer, laid a track of wooden rails from his cabin, running back into the "bush," where he could cut his winter's supply of fuel. He built a small flat car with light flanged wheels like those on a regular railroad car.

When he has a supply of logs cut ahead, he piles a load of them on his flat-car, hitches three of his husky dogs in tandem, harnesses them to the front of the car and they draw his load of fuel along the wooden rails up to his cabin.

Jazz-Colored Trees

Scientists are now able, by injecting a dye, to make trees grow any color they like. Thus, maple can be induced to become a deep and valuable mahogany color, oak assume a rich and ancient hue in a few years, and walnut change into a ravishing black, a marvelous material for antique dealers. Blue, green, red, violet, and orange trees are easily productible; their planks harmonizing with modern color schemes. To achieve these jazz effects, the tree surgeon drills a number of holes in the roots, also round the trunk, about four feet from the ground, and connects them up with rubber pipes to a feeding tank, fixed in a fork overhead. Normally, ten pounds of dye is sufficient to color a tree.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Song Life Is Shorter

Because of radio and the decrease in sheet music sales, the life of a popular song has been considerably shortened. When a song becomes a hit, it is played six and seven times a night until even the apathtic radio audience gets more than a little fed up, writes Drew Kent, in Redbook Magazine.

There was a time, in good old days, when a song could retain its popularity for as long as twelve or fourteen months—now it is the unusual tune which is still played after eight weeks. As a result, the Tin Pan Alley salesmen have very little leisure time. New songs are turned out with the same monotonous regularity as tin cans in a factory; and it is up to the plugger to regard each one as a potential hit.

Chops Off Foot; Walks, Rides To Hospital

Coleraine—Out of the North Woods this week comes the story of old pioneer grit. It is told of a man named Washburn, who was chopping wood in Aitkin county. As he told the story, he was chopping wood and felt something hit his foot. Raising it from the ground, he found that the front half of it was completely severed, boots, sox, and all. Washburn was alone, but he managed to hobble to the house and get on a horse, which he rode three-quarters of a mile to the road, where it happened that the school bus was passing. The bus took him to Hill City, and he was driven from there to the hospital. Although a tourniquet had been applied, the loss of blood from the injury was extreme. Nothing daunted by the accident, Washburn nonchalantly announced that "someone had better go back to the woods and pick up his foot".

IMPROPER CARE OF EGGS MEANS LOSS

Cool Storage Room Needed in Summer Time.

By H. H. Alp, Poultry Extension Specialist, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

Complaints of consumers about the low quality of eggs sometimes offered for sale during summer months can often be traced to careless management on the part of people handling the eggs after they leave the farm.

Poor quality eggs tend to reduce purchases by housewives, and this in turn lowers the prices and profits received by both farmers and dealers. Thus with the arrival of warm weather, greater care should be taken in handling eggs as a truly perishable product.

Too commonly eggs are held in the back room of a store which also serves as storage space for various items, some of which should never be in the same room with eggs. This room during the summer months will frequently have a temperature high enough to start the incubation of fertile eggs.

Another criticism in this connection is that often the small country buying stations do not have satisfactory places to hold a product as perishable as eggs.

In one instance last summer, when the prevailing temperature was about 90 degrees Fahrenheit, there was a produce house consisting of a large room covered by a sheet metal roof. In this room poultry was being fed and eggs stored until time for delivery to the next buyer. Regardless of how good the quality of those eggs when originally received by this dealer, they would quickly deteriorate under such conditions.

The level of egg prices depends a good deal on consumer demand, and this fact makes it important to maintain quality if the maximum returns to be gained by both the farmer who cares for the flock and the dealer and merchant who handle the eggs between producer and consumer.

Sun Porch Will Benefit Growing Young Chicks

A sun porch attached to the brooder house is a most valuable improvement to have. For the little chicks to have a clean place, one absolutely free from disease germs and parasites, to roam during fair weather, is invaluable, says a poultryman in Wallaces' Farmer. They may occupy the brooder house until the cockerels are sold as broilers, after which the pullets can be transferred to summer shelter on the range, away from contaminated ground. These sun porches must be thoroughly cleaned once every year. That is, six or eight inches of the dirt should be removed from the floor after the pullets are taken to the range, and fresh sand or gravel added, ready for the next year's chicks. When such precautions are taken and fresh, clean range is supplied each year, loss from disease and parasites will be reduced to a minimum.

Sun parlors may be built the same size as the brooder house, surrounded by wire netting high enough so the birds will not fly out. This adds expense, but it contributes greatly to the health of the young birds, and the extra sunshine which they get while exercising in these parlors promotes rapid growth.

Solves Green Feed Problem

Sprouted oats or barley will easily solve the green feed problem for the back-yard poultry keeper with a small-sized flock. The simplest and possibly one of the best ways to provide for them is to level off a small piece of ground, place the grains to be sprouted directly on the soil and cover them with a piece of burlap or gunny sack kept continually moist. When the grain has sprouted one-quarter to one-half inch it is ready to feed. The length of time required to sprout will of course depend upon the weather. If small particles of dirt adhere to the sprouts when fed, no harm, but rather benefit, results. By preparing small plots each day, a constant supply can be maintained.

The Plymouth Rock

Plymouth Rock is the name applied to a type of poultry originated in the United States as a result of cross-breeding and selection for the purpose of attaining certain characteristics of formation, color or utility. This general type has been subdivided into several varieties within the breed which are known as Barred Plymouth Rocks, or Barred Rocks; Buff Rocks, Partridge Rocks, Silver Penciled Rocks, all of which have been recognized by the American Standard of Perfection.

Table Scraps as Food

Poultry keepers, who have small flocks in confinement to provide eggs for the table, can profitably use scraps from the table if these materials are handled in the right way. No salty foods should be given, nor any moldy food of any kind. Bread or crusts are often dangerous to poultry unless first baked crisp in a hot oven to break down the starch cells which set up fatty tissue. Potato peelings, also waste vegetables, may be boiled along with meat scraps.

Airplanes Used In Locating Cattle

Hibbing — Mayor Timmerman of Hibbing announced recently that he had authorized Bill Garrity, a former World War aviator, and Pharis Sarff, local aviation instructor, to fly a plane as low as possible over the woods north of Nashwauk in an effort to locate cattle with binoculars. The animals are federal cattle that have strayed into the woods, and an effort is being made to butcher them and bring them to Hibbing to be stored for distribution to needy families during the winter. Charts of the location of the animals will be made, and village crews will be sent out to shoot them and bring them out to roads to be loaded onto trucks. Permission has been obtained from the federal government to take all of the cattle, which are choice herefords, that can be found.

Swordfish Health Food

Discovery that the livers of certain food fish species contain substances high in content of vitamins that are important in the diet of human beings has probably had much to do with their being fished for intensively, says the Detroit News. Now the swordfish, heretofore pursued chiefly as a matter of sport fishing, bids fair to join the group of fishes sought for their vitamins. Cod liver oil has long been a standby as a builder of strength and a food designed to ward off disease. The discovery in recent years that halibut livers possess elements similar to the valuable constituents of cod liver oil to an even greater degree has led to fairly extensive manufacture of haliver oil.

Russian Hangman Dead

Philipeff, for several years official hangman of Russia, died in poverty in a small village in the Ukraine, according to reports from Riga, Latvia. During his term of office he executed 937 persons, 178 during the reign of the late czar and 759 during the three years of Bolshevik rule from 1917 to 1920. His nerve gave way and he was obliged to retire, although still a comparatively young man. Philipeff was considerate to the persons he was ordered to hang, and he kept a careful record of every execution. Against each victim's name he added notes describing his bearing when faced with death.

"Trade Last"

"Trade last" is popularly used as a compliment, particularly to one of the opposite sex. The meaning is: "If you will say something agreeable you have heard about me, I shall say something agreeable I have heard about you." While there is a trading of compliments between the parties, the phrase would indicate a preference for the last one to be spoken.

Chinaman's Chance

"Chinaman's chance" is generally employed in the sense of "a very poor chance" or "no chance at all." It is thought that the phrase had its origin in the early mining days in the West, when the Chinese, who were in a hopeless minority, had no chance at all if caught in any infraction of the law.

Boy Hunter Bags Horned Rabbit

Sauk Center—The days of pink elephants and green lizards passed out with the eighteenth amendment, they say, but here's one about horned rabbits. Not long ago Norbert Botz went hunting for rabbits. He shot one, but didn't like its looks, and left it laying in the field. The boy told his parents he had shot a rabbit with horns, and they sent him back to get it. Sure enough, the rabbit had horns growing from the back of the ears. The horns are explained as a kind of fungus growth not uncommon in rabbits.

Alert Woman Shopper Snares Stray Turkey

Fairbault — A trucking company made an unwitting contribution to someone's Christmas dinner recently at Fairbault. 3 turkeys escaped from a crate perched on top of the truck. Two were easily recaptured and returned to the crate, but a third, more lively and sensing freedom took to the air. He was brought up sharply against a drug store window, when a woman shopper, barely nosing out several competitors in a close race for the bird, seized it fondly by the neck and started home with her Christmas dinner.

BELL-LIKE ROCKS IN PENNSYLVANIA

A new set of ringing rocks, made famous throughout Pennsylvania because of their vibrant qualities, have been found near the quaint historical town of Riegelsville.

With the aid of a small metal hammer, a clear ringing, as from a bell, can be made to emanate from the rocks. However, all the rocks in the area, which covers several hundred square feet, do not ring. Scientists believe that the rock must be partly suspended in order to give off the bell-like sounds.

Samuel G. Gordon, associate curator of the department of mineralogy at the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, believes volcanic-activity 199,000,000 years ago during the time of the dinosaurs made the bell-like rocks possible.

Gordon said they were not placed there by volcanic eruption, as was often believed, but were exposed when the soil was washed away during the millions of years.

The rocks are of the diabese, or trap rock class, and one of three types of rocks that ring. The other two are stalactites found in caves and phonolite, a volcanic rock found in the western part of the country.

Film Sea Bottom From Deck

Undersea motion pictures may be made without getting off the deck of the ship by means of a periscope camera. The periscope, which is made with extension tubes for convenience in carrying, is attached to a water-tight case designed to hold a 35 millimeter camera, which is wound, operated and focused from outside the case and from the safety of ship deck. The outfit can be adjusted to take scenes from any angle. The optical system permits use of as many extension tubes as desired, so that the camera may be submerged to great depths. To prevent fogging of the lenses, the equipment has a ventilating system through the tube.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

THE word party has a flexible significance. It may be a political group, or a social assembly, or any one of many things, but as a home word it means a company invited to come at a certain time on a specified day with entertainment as the object. There is an interesting question which arises in connection with such an assemblage, although the above is appreciated as explanatory. What do you expect of a party? This is the question. Little children expect games as a minor feature, with food as the major one. The question of the child who was belated in arriving has become classic. "Is the party over?" he asked, and was delighted it wasn't when he found the refreshments had not been served. Almost every child would agree that the real "party" was the refreshments.

There are adult parties which proclaim that food is the main feature such as a dinner party, luncheon, supper party, tea party, theater supper, etc. And although there is no mention of a meal in an after the theater party it is as well recognized as one for refreshments, as if it were called a theater supper, the latter, however, suggesting more of a meal than the former.

Entertainment Essential.

While food is one element expected of a party, it does not in itself provide the gaiety needed. A group of persons eating food, however excellent and elaborately served and prepared for the guests, fails of its function as a party unless the persons are entertained. Brilliant and witty conversation is pleasing diversion in itself, and when accompanied by a "dish of tea" or more elaborate dishes, it provides the required merriment and good cheer. It devolves upon the hostess to invite congenial spirits for such an occasion. Nothing is more depressing than a dinner or supper party without laughter and gaiety. No amount of edible delicacies can make up for such a lack. On the other hand simple food with a happy group has the necessary elements of a party. There is entertainment.

This matter of entertainment is more important than food. Ask any bridge expert whether it is the food or the games of contract which he looks for at a card party. All persons who go to a party, whatever its kind, unless actually hungry or over-fond of eating, hope to have a good time apart from the taste of the viands. Laughter, gaiety, companionship, absorbing entertainment, these are wanted, something which takes them out of themselves, which makes them forget their usual engrossing work, their perplexities or possibly physical pain, and which makes life even more worth living. A hostess who can instill any or all of these pleasant elements into her parties has successful ones, whatever the refreshments. Parties need not cost much, since merriment, happiness, gaiety, good cheer are apart from monetary values. This is a period when parties are heartening. Happy events lend cheer to perplexed spirits.

Decorative Doors.

Decorative outside doors are the style, the accent naturally being on front doors. This idea of making the doors distinctive, sprang into favor first in tea houses, but the popularity has spread until there is almost a craze for dressy doors.

The decoration may consist of bright paint. This may be featured also in blinds, and possibly in trim of the house. The vogue of extending the color scheme to front doors, and then, necessarily, to all of the outside doors pushes the fashion to its furtherest limit on the house itself. Occasionally a low fence is painted to match, or a trellis against the house. But it is the doors that are the bizarre feature. Hitherto these have been conservative architectural elements, as far as color was concerned. There is something refreshingly cheerful about having an entrance door gay.

The hardware of a door can lend distinction. There are many types of hinges which make these necessities artistic. Some are reproductions of old-fashioned models, some are decidedly new in construction. It is essential when making selections, to suit the model of hardware to the period of the door.

Peeling Onions

When you have a number of onions to peel, cover them with hot water and let stand for a minute or two, and that thin skin so hard to get off can be removed as if by magic.

Egg Stains

Egg stains on table linen should be soaked in cold water before being sent to the laundry. The stains come out quite easily if treated in this way. Hot water sets them and makes them doubly difficult to remove.

Highway Employees Organize In Union

Local Union No. 13 of the Independent Union of All Workers was organized at the court house in Thief River Falls, December 2, at a meeting of state highway employees of Minnesota Maintainance District No 5, which is composed of seven counties of Northwestern Minnesota. The district union headquarters will be in Thief River Falls, while the home office of the organization is at Austin, Minnesota.

Gjesdahl, Crookston, treasurer; Arvid Wickstrom, Strandquist, financial secretary; and Herman A. Kjos, Thief River Falls, recording secretary. A director from each of the seven counties in the district, comprising a board of directors will be elected at the next regular meeting of the organization. The union has about 15,000 members in Minnesota, South Dakota, Iowa and Wisconsin.

Historical Pageant At Winter Shows

An elaborate pageant depicting the history of the Red River Valley will be one of the most important features of the silver anniversary celebration of the Northwest School Farmers' Week and Red River Valley Winter Shows. 13 Red River Valley counties are expected to take part in the pageant, each county presenting some outstanding scene relating to the rapid development which has taken place in Northwestern Minnesota. The plan includes the appointment of a pageant director in each county. The county director will then select the personnel and supervise the presentation of the scene for that particular county.

According to present plans, this will be the most elaborate historical pageant ever presented in the Northwest. An unusual amount of historical material is available as indicated by the preliminary reports issued from time to time by the various county historical associations. Furthermore, numerous local and county pageants have been presented, thus indicating special interest in such a subject.

The pageant is to be presented at one of the large mass meetings one evening during Winter Shows Week. The central committee has announced unusual interest on the part of those counties which has been approached. Supt. Theodore C. Blegen of the Minnesota Historical society has offered the full cooperation of his organization.

Legislature Opens

The Minnesota legislature formally opened its 1935 session Tuesday at the state capitol. Independents seemed to have the upper hands in both houses and had their way in organization of both bodies. George W. Johnson, Independent member from Duluth, was elected speaker of the house over H. H. Barker of Elbow Lake, after spirited debate, 82 to 49. The session will continue for 90 actual working days which will bring the closing date to some time in April.

Remaining assets will be taken over for benefit of the stockholders as soon as the receiver is discharged.

Corn-Hog Contracts

All eligible producers of corn and hogs will have an opportunity to sign the 1935 contract, whether or not they took part in the 1934 corn-hog adjustment program, says R. M. Douglass, the county agent.

Those eligible include persons operating their own farms, and tenants operating farms on cash rent or share basis. Eligibility in all cases will be determined by the county allotment committee, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The contract will require hog adjustments on individual farms to 10 percent below the average 1932-33 production, with benefit payments of $15 per head on number represented by the 10 percent adjustment. Complete details may be had from the county agent.

Clifford W. Bouvette, Supervisor of the Census, in charge of the 9th Congressional district, has been authorized to speak in behalf of the Administration over WDAY, of Fargo at 7:10 p. m., Monday, Jan. 14th.

Commenting with Mr. Bouvette concerning the nature of his address, he advised a representative for this paper that his talk would deal entirely with census matters, the reason for taking same and would otherwise dispense facts concerning the census which is of vital and important interest to farmers.

It is suggested that all farmers living in this county keep the hour of this broadcast in mind and tune in to hear what Mr. Bouvette has to say.

There are approximately 2,000 applications on file for appointment, whereas the field force requires approximately the appointment of 300 enumerators. Under the terms of a ruling established by the the Census Department, enumerators must be actual residents of farms, Mr. Bouvette said.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

Record Age for Turtle

When the British acquired the island Mauritus in 1810, they also acquired a turtle, who at that time was known to be forty-four years old. The turtle lived on in the artillery barracks at Fort Louis until 1918, when it died. By living those 152 years under the supervision of inhabitants of the island, the turtle received the distinction of attaining a greater age than any other back-boned animal, says the Field Museum of Natural History in Chicago. The turtle was known to be 152 years old when it died. But since it was not young when captured, it is possible that it lived to be 200.

The Isle of Pines

The Isle of Pines is about 30 miles south of Cuba, of which it forms a dependency. The north of the island is mountainous. There are mineral deposits and marble is quarried. The south is flat and marshy, forming everglades. Cattle raising is the chief occupation, but there is also trade in tobacco, mahogany, pine and cedar woods. The isle has an area of 1,200 square miles. The capital is Nueva Gerona. Santa Fe is the largest town. The island was discovered by Columbus in 1494.

Valparaiso

Valparaiso is Spanish for Vale of Paradise. This chief seaport of Chile dates back to 1535. Immediately behind the shore the hills begin to rise, reaching a height of 1,000 feet. The city, containing a quarter of a million people, is built on these hillsides. On clear days, Mt. Aconcagua, the highest point on this hemisphere, can be seen, towering above its Andean brothers.

Human Incapacity

Scientists who have calculated the percentage of human incapacity wrought by 23 physical disabilities, rate total blindness 100 per cent, loss of one whole leg 75 per cent, loss of one hand or one foot, 40 per cent, loss of hearing in both ears 50 per cent, in one ear 10 per cent, and loss of one eye 30 per cent.

Direct Taxes

Direct taxes are paid at first hand by the owner of the thing taxed. Real estate and income taxes are examples of direct taxes. Indirect taxes are those where it is recognized from the beginning that the individual who pays in the first instance usually passes on the charge to some one else who may again pass it on until it finally reaches the subject who bears the burden.

Bat Not Rodent

The bat, though it somewhat resembles rats and mice in appearance and its nocturnal habits, does not belong to the order of rodents which includes them. Bats form an entirely separate order of mammals, the Chiroptera, distinguished by the wing or membrane which extends from the body to the ends of the feet. Our bats are all insectivora, while many species of the Old world feed on fruits.

LEATHER, WALLPAPER BEING MADE OF WOOL

Extraordinary new uses for Australia's wool are being discovered. By a new process soft and durable leather has been made from it. Even the shiny surface of patent leather is being produced from the fibers, interwoven and specially treated.

Experiments are being made in the use of wool for wallpaper, and it is being tried as an insulating material for electric cables.

Perhaps the most astounding woolen article yet made is in possession of a woolbroking office in Melbourne. It is a driving pinion from an 18-ton power excavator which has been used constantly for more than two years. The cogs and interior of the pinion are made entirely of wool. Steel plates lie at each end, taking no part in the work, but merely giving support to the woolen cogs, which have the appearance of vulcanite. The layers of which the cog is formed have been subjected to extreme pressure in hardening fluid to give solidity.

Zulu-Britain Treaty Found

Discovery of the historic original treaty, dated June 21, 1837, between Dinneaan, the king of the Zulus, and the king of England, which cedes in effect all of Natal to Great Britain, is considered one of the most important finds of the century. The king's representative who signed on his behalf was Capt. Alan Gardiner. Stowed away in his papers, the document has been almost around the world. It was found by Dr. C. J. Ulys, of Martzburg, in a bundle of papers belonging to the Gardiner family in Durban, Natal. Captain Gardiner, who was a missionary, found his way to Tierra del Fuego, in South America, where he was ultimately starved to death by the hostile inhabitants.

Fed by Angels

A Spanish girl who claims not to have eaten or drunk a thing for 15 years has been discovered at Montecille, Burges, by a well-known Riviera occultist. She is Amelia Baranda, a young peasant, who declares that she is "fed by the angels." The girl is under the supervision of doctors, who declare that her digestive system is still normal though slightly withered.

Move On

The bricklayers had just finished the foundations of a house on a suburban estate when a workman, carrying a ladder, stopped to watch them lay the first row of bricks.

One of the bricklayers, looking up from his work and catching sight of the man, said:

"I say, lads, we'd better hurry up. There's a chap 'ere waiting to clean the winders."—Humor (London).

Hen Rides 40 Miles On Bumper Of Auto

Wilmont—Slayton may have its kitten that can successfully ride the rods beneath an auto, but Wilmont has its chicken that last week carried out a more daring fete. W. J. Sievers motored to Slayton to spend a few hours and as he left the garage, the mechanic placed a hen that had taken up quarters in the garage on the rear bumper, thinking to get rid of the pesky fowl when Sievers started traveling 60 miles an hour. Sievers knew nothing of the presence of the hen until he arrived home, more than 40 miles away. During the trip the hen had apparently taken the ride on the bumper as a matter of course and when discovered was apparently very comfortable.

Farmers To Move From Old Homes

Baudette—The spending of $385,000 by the government in Lake of the Woods and Beltrami counties will be undertaken immediately, with farmers moving from their old homes in outlying districts to farms closer to villages, schools, highways and railways. Figures show that out of 306 farmers consulted, 266 have agreed to move. Land was appraised at around $5.75 per acre, the payment by the government to apply on the payment of new farms or in cash, as the farmer whishes. The government will also underwrite loans for the erection of buildings and improvements on the farms, and the tenants can "strip" their old farms of doors, windows, etc., to take for their new homes. The farmers will have their choice of new farms.

Pamphlets Ready On Farm Outlook For 1935

Farm folks who want to get the best information available on the outlook for 1935 may obtain copies of University Farm pamphlet 3-, just out. In addition to the outlook for agricultural prices, the pamphlet contains a most interesting section on the outlook for farm family living in 1935, prepared under the direction of Miss Julia O. Newton. state home demonstration leader, University Farm.

The agricultural section of the outlook statement has been prepared by represtatives of the Department of Agriculture, University of Minnesota, following a conference with members of the U. S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. It deals with the general business and agriculural outlook, indicates important changes in the principal farm enterprises in Minnesota and reflects probable tendencies in agriculture. It is intended to guide farmers in shaping their farm plans for 1935.

Anyone interested may have a copy of this pamphlet free from a county agent or from the Bulletin Office, University Farm, St. Paul.

Train Shears Bumper From Passing Car

Willmar- A train took the front bumper off Benny Johnson's car in Kandiyohi village Christmas day, but gave him a present of his life by leaving him unhurt. Blinded by the snow and wind, Johnson failed to see the train coming and could not hear it because of the blizzard. The first knowledge he and his wife had of the train was when it was right on top of them. The car was literally sheared by the locomotive of the Empire Builder, the front bumper being cut off, the front fenders dented, and a glass broken out of one of the front lamps, but aside from being halt scared out of their wits, neither of the two occupants of the car suffered any injury.

Supt Mark L Burns, of the Cass Lake Lake Consolidated agency, is the man the Chippewa Indains of Minnesota can thank for procuring this new and needed hospital. Health conditions among the Indians will be improved greatly by this added and centrally located hospitalization.

USE OF APPLES IN DAILY MEALS

Innumerable Ways in Which to Employ Them.

By EDITH M. BARBER

WHEN I was a little girl, the arrival of the barrels of Kings, Baldwins and Northern Spies was the signal that the fall was upon us, and it would not be long before winter with its early snows would come. Of course, all the barrels had to be opened immediately, so that we could taste each kind and decide which we liked best.

Nowadays when we buy a weekly supply of apples we do not distinguish perhaps as much among the varieties. We ask for "eating apples" or "cooking apples." You will find a number of varieties on the market, among which the Macintosh is the most popular, as it is good for both eating and cooking.

There are many ways in which we can make use of apples in our meal planning. In many households a bowl of apple sauce is always in the refrigerator ready for serving. Baked apples are a favorite luncheon dessert or breakfast fruit and also sometimes they find a place as a dinner dessert. In this case they are sometimes stuffed with raisins and nuts and served with whipped cream. I have also had them in a more elaborate style, topped with ice cream and surrounded with whipped cream. This dish is known as baked apples Robertson.

There is a great difference of opinion whether baked apples are best when hot or cold. One of my friends will not eat a chilled baked apple, neither will she eat one hot. She is so fussy that she must have her baked apples at room temperature.

Brown Betty or scalloped apples is perhaps used more often than any other apple dessert, if we except our American favorite, apple pie. Personally, I think that there is nothing better than a good apple dumpling. Whether it is baked or steamed it is equally delicious. My father liked them steamed and my mother liked them baked, and because we children were not allowed to have them steamed we naturally preferred them that way. Either a hard sauce or plain cream should be served with apple dumplings—but not whipped cream. Then, of course, there are fried apples, which are so delicious with ham. Have you ever tasted those french fried apple rings which make such a good dessert?

Apple Rings.

1 egg
1 tablespoon melted butter
Salt
½ cup milk
½ cup flour
1 tablespoon sugar
3 to 4 apples

Beat egg yolk, add butter, salt and one-half the milk. Stir in the flour and sugar to make a smooth batter. Add remainder of milk and fold in stiffly beaten egg white. Wash and core apples, but do not pare. Slice one-half inch thick, dip in batter and fry in deep fat, 385 degrees Fahrenheit. Drain on soft paper and sprinkle with granulated sugar.

Brown Betty.

½ loaf bread
¼ cup butter
Cinnamon
3 cups sliced apples
1 cup sugar
¼ cup melted butter
Nutmeg

Cut the bread into cubes and stir into the melted butter. Place bread, apples and the sugar in alternate layers in a greased baking dish. Cover with bread and bake in a hot oven (450 degrees Fahrenheit) for fifteen to twenty minutes and serve with a hard sauce or cream.

Apple Dumpling.

2 cups flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons sugar
5 tablespoons fat
¾ to 1 cup milk

Sift dry ingredients and rub in shortening. Add one-half cup milk and stir lightly with knife until a soft dough is formed. Remove to a floured board, scrape together the remaining flour in the bowl and add enough milk to make a soft dough.

Roll out and cut into squares to fit small pared and cored apples. Sprinkle apples with sugar and cinnamon. Fold dough over apples. Bake in hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) about thirty minutes or steam forty minutes in a tightly covered steamer.

Steamed Pudding.

1 cup molasses
1 cup milk
1 cup chopped suet
3 cups whole wheat flour
1 teaspoon soda
1½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon cloves
½ teaspoon ginger
½ teaspoon nutmeg
1 teaspoon cinnamon
1 cup raisins

Mix molasses and milk and add to suet. Mix dry ingredients well and add raisins. Add all at one time to liquids. Pour into greased models, cover tightly, and steam three hours. Remove covers as soon as molds are taken from steamer. This pudding may be made in large quantities and kept on hand ready for use when reheated.

Publicity?

QUITE suddenly I was not listening to Ronny's interesting reminiscences.

He said: "What's struck you, old man?"

"There's a woman just come in. She's being seated three tables down on the left."

Ronny smiled. "Ah—haven't lost your discerning eye even though you are a forty-five-year-old benedict?"

"Not when they're unusual. This lady is. She has on one of those knitted things and can wear it. She's not young—not beautiful. Mouth too large—face too thin. But there's something—hm—there's not a man in the room who's not given her the once over. When you can turn a little, Ronny . . ."

He shook his head. "Don't have to, Ned. The lady is Avon St. Clair, the star in that Broadway triumph, 'Blemish.' There was quite a sensational story last winter—" he broke off rather abruptly.

"Go on. I'm interested."

Still he hesitated. "I was going to take you to the show tonight—get your unbiased opinion, but—oh, well, it doesn't matter.

"Avon St. Clair was born in the theater—kicked around the footlights from infancy. When she was eighteen, she married a penniless young sap just out of college. They had one child—a son. Lived mighty contented and happy for quite a few years, but of course, she got the stage fever again. It ended in a smash. She went back into the theatrical world taking her boy, and the young sap faded out of the picture.

"She took her old name—Avon St. Clair, but somehow, luck didn't come her way. She finally landed in Hollywood—had one or two successes—then bad casting in a couple of rotten shows.

"She was daffy about her boy—gave him everything with the usual fatal results. A couple of years ago when the crash came she was left on the rocks, high and dry.

"Last fall, Jimmy Golding cannily gave her the lead in 'Blemish.' She put everything she had into that play and if times had been good it would have run 'till the theater fell down. But you know how things were. She got some darn good write-ups, but it wasn't enough.

"Then one matinee afternoon, coming out of the theater, she was invited to enter a closed car, and that evening when it came time to shoot the show, the star was among those missing.

"They got in touch with the son. He had seen nothing of his mother. The morning press blazed—'Avon St. Clair, that fascinating, clever actress in Broadway's finest production of the year, mysteriously disappears!'

"That night, the son got the usual badly written, ill-spelled communication—fifty thousand dollars, to be left at a deserted shanty on Grist Mill road, and no funny business.

"Fifty thousand! Well, it just couldn't be raised.

"The son was frantic. He went to his father, for the sap had become rather a well-known man about town. He recognized the son for what he was—a good-for-nothing spendthrift, but he still did cherish the old love in his heart for Avon St. Clair. He agreed to fork over the fifty thousand, but stipulated that he handle the racket, and he registered a mental resolve to get those kidnapers or die in the attempt."

Ronny turned to give an order to the waiter.

"Well," I smiled, "I suppose the husband notoriously landed the gang, amid the wild applause of the public, and the show leaped to 'S. R. O.' in one spectacular bound."

Ronny fingered the stem of his glass reflectively.

"There's a bit more to the story. He did get the kidnaper. There was a fight—some shooting, and he was quite badly wounded through the shoulder. But he got his man—that good-for-nothing prodigal son."

I gave a little start. "His son—the kidnaper?"

Ronny nodded, with compressed lips. "A bitter disappointment, but it was made easier for both parents with their happy reunion." He pushed back his chair. "Come on, old man—I want you to meet Avon."

Before I knew what it was all about, I was standing beside her table.

"Avon—this is Ned Brocton, an old college chum. He went abroad to study, right after commencement, and made his home at some little place in England. This is the first time in twenty years he's deigned to honor 'the land of the free.'"

She put her hand in mine. "Any friend of Ronny's—" she said in a low, vibrating voice.

"I'm going to take him out to the club this afternoon—show him a good golf course. And tonight I'll take him to a good show."

She smiled up at me. "Ronny is a grand publicity man." Suddenly, a little frown of worriment came into her dark eyes. "If you play golf, you'll be careful, won't you, Ronny dear? Remember—that shoulder—"

Drivers' Licenses Are Good For Life Time

Automobile and truck drivers will not have to renew their driver's licenses yet. As the law now stands, the licenses are good for a life time, but there is a strong possibility that a change will be made by the legislature which meets this month.

Just what the changes may be will depend upon the legislature, but here are some of the proposals:

That the socalled family license plans be discontinued, so that each person who wants to get behind the wheel of a motor vehicle will pay the same amount for a license.

That licenses good for three years be issued for $1 instead of the present 35 cent license which has no time limit.

Lobo Wolf

The name lobo wolf is applied to the gray wolf or timber wolf. It is really a formidable animal, but in its dealings with men it has learned to fear the deadly rifle, the poison pot and the trap. Storms, cold and fatigue affect it but little and its powerful teeth, strong jaws and wide gape enable it to bite with great cutting power. In fighting with dogs, every well aimed snap means either a deep wound or a piece of flesh bitten out.

Evidence of Glacial Period

Thousands of years ago a moving mass of ice covered two-thirds of what is now Ohio and left its imprint upon the surface of the underlying stone foundation of Kelley's island. On this island, ten miles out in Lake Erie from Sandusky, rocks that have been uncovered are deeply cut and the evidences of the glacial period is one of the marvels of the world.

Inventor of Radio

Although many inventors were at work on the theory of wireless, Mahlon Loomis, an American, successfully transmitted signals between two kites about 1865 and patented his system in 1872. He failed to develop it, however, and Guglielmo Marconi, who patented and put to practical use his system of wireless communication in 1898, is considered its inventor or discoverer. Dr. Lee De Forest is regarded as the father of the modern radio as he perfected the audion tube, in 1916, through which the voice was successfully transmitted. First regular radio broadcasts were made from KDKA, in Pittsburgh, in the fall of 1919.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Juvenile and Adult Leaf

It is well known that sometimes the leaves first put out by a seedling differ more or less from those which appear later. The first are known as juvenile, and the latter as adult leaves, says the American Nature association. Perhaps the case most often noted is that of the arbor vitae in which the first leaves are awl-shaped and the later scale-like.

Luncheon for Three

By HARRIET RAMBO

© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate
WNU Service

ROSALIND TOWNLEY entered the restaurant, chose a seat at a vacant table by the wall. She was young and pretty and wore a wedding ring. The day was only half done, and already she had explained to scores of amazed acquaintances that, no, she was not married, the ring was merely part of a sorority initiation. She was determined to eat her lunch in peace, and so she had chosen a restaurant where she did not expect to encounter any of her friends. Surely if she were among strangers, a wedding ring could not prove to be a disturbing element.

A young man, pulling a small child by the hand, entered the restaurant. He sighted the table where Rosalind sat, with its two vacant chairs, and headed for it. He lifted the child to the seat next to Rosalind, and chose for himself, the place opposite her.

It was rather nice, Rosalind thought to see a father take his baby girl out to lunch.

The child squirmed, displayed dimples, caught sight of the green parrot ornamenting one side of Rosalind's smart turban. "Oo, oo, pretty, pretty," squealed the tiny tot in ecstacy. "Dotty hab, Dotty hab," and she extended eager fists toward the object of desire.

"Dotty, Dotty," the man admonished, affixing a restraining hand to the child's shoulder, but the gesture was without effect.

"Pretty, pretty," squealed the diminutive creature again.

Rosalind's face crimsoned; so did the young man's. He seemed to be enormously confused. Suddenly she inclined her head in the child's direction. "It's not to play with," she explained sweetly. "It's just a buckle. See."

But seeing was not enough for Dotty. She uttered a cannibalistic shriek of delight, grabbed the parrot with both chubby fists, and tore it from its abode. A general confusion ensued. The young man endeavored to apologize; Rosalind endeavored to straighten her hat; the baby waved the captured trophy enthusiastically. From a near-by table, some one giggled. A waiter appeared, deposited two menus, beamed on the child.

"You have stolen mamma's buckle," he said, grinning broadly.

Rosalind's face flamed, and a dull red glow lit the young man's cheeks. Then suddenly he looked up boldly. "What shall we have, Mary?" he asked her. "Suppose we begin with consomme and order the rest later."

"I think that would be a good idea, Ted," she murmured, both astonished and thrilled by the grip the stranger took on the situation.

Her answer produced the desired effect. The waiter bowed and disappeared.

"Now, give me the parrot," the young man commanded the child, but the small tyrant ducked the pilfered bird beneath the table cloth. "I say, I'm deucedly sorry," he apologized to Rosalind, and began to search for something in one of his coat pockets.

"What an adorable husband," thought Rosalind with something like a pang of regret in her own lonely heart. "He's the sort who would do anything for the woman he loves, even take his baby daughter to a public eating place." How did girls discover such husbands?

She was certain none of the men she had ever gone around with were as amiable as the gentleman at her table—at least not with young children. It was unfortunate, Rosalind thought to herself.

Now he was thrusting a small white rectangle in her direction. "I'll make this thing right in any way you wish," he said. "Here's my card. I'm representative for Jones and Townley Bonding corporation. Perhaps your husband has heard of the firm."

"I'm sorry but I haven't a husband," replied the confused Rosalind. "I mean: I, I, this ring is only a part of a sorority initiation, and if your baby daughter likes the parrot she may have it. I know about your firm through my father. He is Herman Townley, the president."

"Well say now this is luck," beamed the stranger. "But by the way, this isn't my daughter," he protested, crimsoning again. "Dotty, here, is my sister Mildred's child. I'm Dotty's bachelor uncle, Fred Powell. I'm trying to chaperone the young lady while her mother fulfills an engagement with a dentist."

Just then the waiter appeared with the consomme, and the meal which had suffered such a tempestuous beginning, got under way and approached a satisfying conclusion.

The Word "Demean"

The use of the word demean, meaning "to lower in condition, status, reputation or character, or to lower or humble oneself," is good English, says Literary Digest. It dates from the close of the Sixteenth century, and has been in use since then. Thackeray, in "Vanity Fair," chapter 6, has a reference to Mrs. Sedley's opinion that her son would demean himself by a marriage with an artist's daughter. Others who have made use of this word in the senses defined above include: Abbott (1601), Burton (1659), Barker (1715), Davis (1710), Rollins (1734), Doddridge (1751), Richardson (1754), George Eliot (1859), Hawthorne (1862), William Black (1876), and many later writers.

John Baysinger Dies

John Baysinger, age 78, died Sunday morning after a long illness, at the Mauritz Brink farm in Black River township where he made his home. Mr. Baysinger was born in Iowa, and for several years made his home at Eagle Bend in this state. Later he went to Vancouver, Wash., and stayed there for a time. In 1911 he came to this village with the H. R. Allen family when they moved here from Washington, and he has resided here since. He is survived by a brother, George, with whom he made his home, and by another brother, Lewis Baysinger at Stewart, Minn. His parents, two sisters, and three brothers preceded him in death. Mr. Baysinger was a quite, friendly man, well thought of by all who knew him. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. B. Smith at the local Methodist church Tuesday afternoon, and interment took place in the cemetery east of the village. Sympathy of many friends is extended to the bereaved brothers.

At present, butterfat is commanding the highest price it has at any time during the past three years.

Making Seed Survey

Township chairmen in all townships in this county have been requested to ascertain and make a list of those who have seed grain for sale this year, as well as a list of those who desire to buy seed. Compiliation of such lists will greatly simplify the matter of bringing sellers and buyers of seed together. In many cases it will save both time and money for buyers who may not be aware that seeds they desire can be bought from neighbors nearby. Lists for the townships in this part of the county have been left at the creamery. Those who have seed to sell should list the varieties and amounts they have, and those who want to buy seed should list their wants. There is no charge of any kind in connection with this listing which is being done simply to bring sellers and buyers into contact.

Anniversary Sale

M. H. Jackson has a page adv in this issue, and also has bills out advertising a big sale in commemoration of his 21 anniversary in business in St. Hilaire. Be sure to attend the big sale and get your share of the extra good values offered.

A bill is now in preparation and will soon be introduced in the legislature by Senator Rockne, which proposes to scale down farm mortgages now held by the Rural Credit Bureau. Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

PASTRY MAKING ISN'T A PUZZLE

Expert Says It's All in Art of Knowing How.

By EDITH M. BARBER

FOR some reason or another, pastry is considered difficult to make. Of course, it is all in knowing how, and I can assure you if you follow the recipe I am giving you today, you will become famous for your tender pastry.

Let me warn you that it is better to chop in the fat rather than rub it in with your fingers, as the warmth of your hands melts the fat, which should be hard to get the best results. Cold water is essential, and you must add only enough to hold the mixture together.

The recipe which I am giving you, cranberry and raisin pie, is sometimes known as mock cherry pie. It is so good itself that it does not need to imitate any other fruit. As you know, I do not like to insult any good food by calling it "mock" something else. If it is worthy to be served, it should be given the credit it deserves.

Some one has asked for a recipe for jelly tarts. "I can't seem to get a jelly that will not run when it hits the heat of the stove." The best way to solve this problem is not to expose the jelly to the heat of the oven. The tart shell should be baked and then have the jelly put upon it.

Pastry.

1½ cups flour
½ teaspoon salt
½ cup fat
Cold water

Sift together the flour and salt. Cut in the fat with two case knives. For a large quantity a wooden bowl and chopping knife may be used. When fine, add at one side of the bowl one tablespoonful of cold water and stir in as much of the flour and fat as the water will take up. Continue this until you have four or five balls of dough and some dry flour left in the bowl. Press together with your fingers. If all the dry flour is not taken up add a little more water. Chill and roll.

Jelly Tarts.

Roll pastry one-eighth inch thick, shape with round cutter, first dipped in flour; with a small cutter remove the centers from half of the rounds. A doughnut cutter may be used instead of a small cutter. Brush the rounds without the hole with cold water near the edges, fit on the rings and press together. Bake fifteen minutes in a very hot oven (500 degrees Fahrenheit). Cool and fill with jam or jelly.

Cranberry Raisin Pie.

2 cups cranberries
1 cup raisins
1¼ cups sugar
2 tablespoons flour

Cut the cranberries in half, mix with the raisins, sugar and flour, and bake between crusts or bake in one crust. Use hot oven (450 degrees Fahrenheit) for fifteen minutes, then moderate oven for twenty minutes. A meringue may be used for a one-crust pie

Sour Cream Pie.

1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup sour cream
¼ cup chopped raisins
½ teaspoon cloves
½ teaspoon cinnamon
¼ teaspoon salt
2 eggs
½ cup confectioner's sugar

Mix the sugar and cream together. Add the raisins, seasoning and the eggs, well beaten. Line a pie dish with pastry. Pour in the mixture and bake in a hot oven (450 degrees Fahrenheit) fifteen minutes. Remove from the oven. Beat the whites of the eggs with the confectioner's sugar to a stiff meringue. Cover the pie with it and return it to a slow oven (375 degrees Fahrenheit) long enough for the meringue to brown, about fifteen minutes.

Tea Muffins.

1 cup dry bread crumbs
1 cup milk
½ cup molasses
1 egg
1½ cups whole wheat flour
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon soda
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon nutmeg
¼ teaspoon cloves
2 tablespoons melted fat

Soften the bread crumbs in milk, add eggs, slightly beaten, melted fat and molasses. Mix dry ingredients, and add at one time to other mixture. Bake about twenty-five minutes in medium oven (375 degrees F.).

Tea Bread.

2 cups whole wheat flour.
½ teaspoon salt
¼ cup sugar
¾ cup chopped dates or raisins
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ cup peanut butter
1 cup milk

Mix dry ingredients, rub in peanut butter, add fruit and stir in milk. Pour into small bread pan and bake in moderate oven (300 degrees F.) about an hour.

Mayor's Name Forged On 2 Checks In Two Days

Marshall—If there is anything connected with the superstition that certain numbers are lucky or unlucky for certain individuals Mayor Middleton of Marshall certainly must consider 1120 and 1220 a couple of Jonahs. The Mayor's name has been forged to check twice in the last two weeks, both times the amount was for $11.20 and both times the number of the check was 1220. Both checks were cashed in Minneota by a transient, it is believed. Apparently the officers of the First National Bank at Marshall knew their signatures for both checks were immediately refused as forgeries.

Sheriff Injury In Collision With Legger

Clarfield—Sheriff Fitzner, of Yellow Medicine county, apprehended an alleged criminal in a most violent and unusual manner here recently. He was cruising around seeking clues to the recent Taunton bank robbery—when he noticed a car coming careening toward him on the highway. Although the sheriff swerved his car as far to the right as possible the oncoming machine seemed to be out of control of its driver and crashed full into the side of Fitzner's car. The sheriff suffered a broken leg and a head injury, in the accident, but the driver of the other car received worse injuries, being unconscious for several days. Upon investigation it was found that the strange driver was Lovine Melby, of Canby and that his car contained a goodsized load of liquor being illegally transported. A charge of bootlegging will probably be proffered against Melby if he recovers.

Youthful Santa Is Presented With Watch

Granite Falls-13-year-old Thurman was a mighty happy boy New Year's day dispite the fact that his hands and face were swathed in bandages as the result of the burns he received while playing Santa Claus at a school program. It looked like a pretty dull vacation for the boy after his Santa Claus suit caught fire while he was playing Santa at a school program, from lighted candles, and he was badly burned before the fire was extinguished. But the neighbors and friends didn't forget him and and he was deluged with presents. Those who did'nt know what to give him, got up a purse and turned it over to his parents. They knew what he wanted, and wasted no time in seeing that he got it—a new wrist watch.

McNeil Island Penitentiary

McNeil Island penitentiary was established by an act of congress in 1867 As the original records are not now at the prison, the actual date of opening the prison is not certain. It appears that the institution was under the Department of the Interior for the first few years of its history. The government owns about 489 acres on the island. The institution has not been constructed in accordance with a careful plan as was the case at Leavenworth and Atlanta, but the construction program of the last few years has resulted in a group of buildings modern for the most part, though the maintenance shops in the earlier buildings are old and inadequate.

Sally and Her Pearls

By ALICE DUANE

© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate
WNU Service

SALLY would not have gone to the dance at all if she had her own way about it, but Jim talked her into it.

"I have nothing to wear," said Sally.

"Make something out of that sofa pillow," advised Jim, "and you'll look a thousand times better than the average."

And as a matter of fact there was not a more beautiful girl at the great ball than Sally in her wisp of evening gown that she had fashioned, her gray slippers and stockings to match, and the whole topped as Jim put it by her red riot of curls.

"That old string of beads could be a priceless lot of pearls for all anyone here might know," he told her as they danced.

"And if they were real," retorted Sally, "I would not be here seeking patrons for my art shop—I could have such a gorgeous shop that people would come in spite of themselves." She toyed gracefully with the long string of beads in question. "Oh, dear! Isn't that the limit—right in the middle of the ballroom!" she exclaimed, and a brilliant blush sprang swiftly to her cheeks. The string had broken and the beads were rolling everywhere at once.

Of course, she was the center of attention, and all the dancers stopped to help rescue what they supposed to be pearls.

"Please don't bother," said Sally, "they are only beads."

Nevertheless they were nearly all restored to her and she put them carelessly into her small vanity bag.

A young man, however, sitting watching the affair had picked up a few of the beads and having overheard Sally's remark about their value, looked carefully at them.

"Hmph! I think I'll show these to Barney—look like the real thing to me. Perhaps I can do the young lady a good turn. Rather fancy her any way." He managed, by much inquiry, to find out who Sally was and that she had a little shop where she sold lamp shades, cushions and other such trifles.

And as Sally and Jim strolled up Park avenue to the tiny place that was Sally's home, Jim wished with all his heart that he was anything but an independent artist who dared not tell the only girl how much he loved her. He had been quite ashamed to give her the old string of beads on the occasion of her birthday some few years back, but it was all he had in his scant possessions.

When Sally said good night she apologized softly for having caused such a scene at the dance.

"I didn't want to let that crowd know how much I valued all of those beads, Jim, but I think we found most of them." She gave his hand an extra warm squeeze and slipped up the stairs. "Come early Sunday afternoon," she called back to him.

Sunday was the happiest day of their week, for Sally, tired of her own cooking, let Jim get her tea and supper Sunday nights.

And on this Sunday evening while Sally was idly running through some music and Jim was making something delicious in the kitchen, some one knocked at the front door. Sally hastened to see who it might be and whether her nice evening with Jim, was to be shared with a third person.

That third person happened to be the young man who had picked up three of the beads from Sally's string. After telling her his mission he was promptly invited in.

And when Sally told him that she had a string of them that would go three times around her neck the young man gasped.

"My dear young lady," he excitedly told her, "if all those beads are of the value of the three I picked up you have a set of pearls worth at least fifty thousand dollars."

"Jim," she shouted, "come quickly—I'm going to faint!" And when Jim rushed from the kitchen with a pan of steaming pigs-in-blankets in his hand, she stood up, braced her shoulders and decided not to faint. "No, I won't," she said, and turned to the strange young man. "Tell Mr. Barnes what you have just said."

Jim had all he could do to keep the steaming Sunday night supper from gracing the studio floor.

"They've been in the Barnes family for ages—I don't think their value was ever suspected," he said calmly. "My pal says that is only a rough estimate—they may be worth double that amount."

"In that case I shall most certainly faint," laughed Sally, and invited the strange young man to stay for supper.

But something in the eyes of these two artists prevented him from accepting. The fire and hope and love lying there were not to be intruded upon. He left them to their happiness.

First Skates Shin Bones

Skating, that is, roller skating, had its inception back in the days following the Civil war. A New York inventor named Plimpton is credited with the invention of the roller skate, although in 1819 a French inventor had patented a skate known as a wheel skate. The Plimpton invention, patented in 1865, was the real beginner of roller skating, however. Ice skating goes much farther back. The earliest record of ice-skating decribes skates made from shin bones of animals for runners. The skater used a pole to propel himself along the ice.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

ORDINARY envelopes can be so used that they are helps in housekeeping as well as fulfilling their function in correspondence. The envelopes can be small, medium sized, and large according to their uses. Readers who enjoy detective stories will recall how those who are seeking to discover the criminal, are inveterate users of envelopes of which they seem always to have a limitless stock in their pockets. Into different ones are thrust bits of gravel, threads, etc., which may reveal some bits of evidence, and form valuable clues. This only goes to show some uses of envelopes. Others can be as valuable to homemakers as, for instance, in tabulating papers requiring classification, making them more readily accessible, and less time-consuming to find.

The envelope filing system is one not to be disregarded in the home where it can be as useful as in an office. There are filing envelopes available. The faces have ruled lines on which to write the gist of each paper, enough to catalogue the contents. While these are convenient, anyone can make satisfactory filing envelopes by using manila envelopes approximately 8½ by 4½ inches in size. The face can be ruled in ink down its entire surface, the lines being spaced about one inch apart. The flap should open toward the right when the back is toward the user as this permits the contents being withdrawn in the handiest way. These envelopes can be for miscellaneous contents, alphabetically arranged. Or different packages can be for different subjects such as recipes, in one alphabetical set; clippings in another. Locations of household things can be kept in another set. This is a convenient set, since by consulting the contents under linens, accessories, etc., which may be packed away, all searching for wanted articles is eliminated.

Handy for Clippings.

Many persons prefer keeping such a filing system for clippings instead of pasting them in scrapbooks, for in the envelopes each clipping can be taken out for use when needed, and unwanted clippings can be discarded at will. In a scrapbook the clippings are permanently placed.

In starting a stamp collection, envelopes can be used for cataloguing them. Small envelopes are recommended for this. I use envelopes in size approximately two by three inches with the name of the kind and denomination clearly penned on the face of each, together with a number stating how many stamps are in an envelope.

Large envelopes are handy to use when packing luggage. Small articles can be slipped in them, and each kind be kept separate, neat, fresh and easily accessible.

Value of Patience.

Patience is not only a virtue. It is also part of the price paid for success. No one gets success in a day or a year. The culmination comes some day, and some year, but not the day nor the year in which the person starts on the road to it. If a person loses patience anywhere along the road and ceases to work toward the end desired, he or she pays the price by forfeiting this culmination, this peak called success. It is only when the person has patience to carry him over the long period of interim between the start and the finish, or rather the culmination, that he wins out.

The fiber of patience is not destroyed by trepidation unless this gets the upper hand and makes one vacilate and lose tenacious perseverance. Patience and tranquility are not exact synonyms, although they are often confused in people's minds. Patience is the exercise of sustained perseverance and forbearance and it can also be a calm waiting or expectation. It is no small thing to endure when things seem to go wrong. To persist against obstacles and, although discouraged, to have the patience to play a waiting game, this is the very essence and fiber of the virtue.

January Jubilee A Big Success

The January Jubilee put on by the Womens Club at the school last Friday evening was a big success. Despite extremely cold weather, a large crowd turned out. The one-act play, "Squaring it with the Boss", with its well chosen cast consisting of Alice Skottem, Mrs. Myles Jackson, Mrs. Reiersgord, M. H. Jackson, Elroy Johnson, and Garth Schantzen. and his cat, was roundly applauded.

The Kitchen Cabinet Orchestra, under leadership of Mrs. Henry Sande, brought forth the fact that homemakers are equal to any task for members were busy the following morning putting back into use the articles that on Friday night served as cornets, slide trombones, drums, and even a shower boquet for the bride. The story of the musical romance was read by Mrs. L. E. Beebe.

The museum or room of curios contained many things of interest from all points of the globe such as coins dating back to B. C., candlesticks made in 1540, photos and albums more than a hundred years old, some very fine Indian relics, interesting stone formations--in fact, almost a roomful of interesting things. The feature was one visited by practically everyone present that evening.

Needless to say, the roll-ball game, candy tables, and the cafeteria with its fine variety of good foods, were all busy and popular places. The ladies are to be commended for sponsering such a delightful evening, and they realized a neat sum for their efforts which will be used by them for carrying on their activities for betterment of the community.

The Women's Club meets this (Thursday) evening at 8 o'clock at the club room. Members will answer roll call by brief answer to "Where I would like to spend a week's vacation in Minnesota, and why". Membership list is open and any woman may become a member.

With a stack of the new seed catalogs, an easy chair, and a good hot fire in the kitchen stove, the present time is almost as good as summer.

A hot battle is being waged in Congress by the factions favoring different forms of old age pensions. The administration proposal which would provide pensions of $30.00 a month, half to be contributed by the federal government, and half by the states, seems to have the best backing.

Fred Gunstad, who publishes a newspaper at Pilot Point, Texas, writes that winter wheat is advanced enough so it provides good pasturage at this time in vicinity where he is located. Quite a contrast to northern Minnesota at this time of the year.

Death and desolation has followed in wake of the present cold wave. Over forty deaths are directly attributed to the extreme cold, and much suffering has resulted especially in those districts that are unprepared for cold weather.

Seattle Man Dies In Alaskan Storm

P. A. Hallstrom of Polk Center, received word this week of the death of his son-in-law, George Martin, which occured in Alaska on January 14th. The following excerpts from a Seattle newspaper give all details available at this time: "Frozen from four days exposure to a tearing gale that swept Valdez Glacier in Southern Alaska, George Martin, Seattle mine operator, died yesterday as rescuers carried him to an airplane and safety. Martin died in the arms of Bob Reeve and Owen Meals, Valdez pilots, a quarter of a mile from their plane. They had landed a mile and a half from where he lay, left by three companions who had gone to seek aid.

"The other men who survived the terrific storm said death got its four day start in the race with the mercy plane as the party crossed the glacier on their way to the Rutherford Gold Mine at Ramsey. The roaring gale swept from a mountain range, they said. and walking thru it was like tunneling thru the solid ice of the glacier. Sheltered at times by boulders, the men struggled for four days until their food was gone. Then Martin became exhausted and fell. An Indian guide and Gene Miller turned back to Valdez. The third companion of Martin, Roy Tippen, stayed with him until forced by hunger and cold to leave. When Miller and the guide reached Valdez, the pilots took off at once, fighting their way thru the aftermath of the storm and finding a landing place on the glacier. They found Martin alive, but badly frozen. He died when the rescuers were within sight of their plane".

Both Mr. and Mrs. Martin are well known in St. Hilaire and vicinity. They were married here January 1st, 1932, and spent balance of that winter here, leaving for Seattle in the spring. Mr. Martin had spent many years in the Coast country engaging in fishing there and in Alaskan waters. He was a fine young man, well liked by everyone with whom he came in contact. Many friends in this vicinity will be grieved to learn of his tragic death. According to word received here by the relatives, Mrs. Martin intended to leave soon as possible for Alaska to return with the body.

Regular meeting of the Businessmens Club was held at the club rooms Monday night.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

CAPE OF VELVET IS NEW WINTER STYLE

It's Shown Both in Black and in Vivid Tones.

The queenly full-length cape of velvet is one of the most dramatic notes of after-dark formality for winter.

What with the divergence in evening gown styles this season, the one safe bet for wear with either a full-skirted robe de style or a slinky streamline gown is the long cape.

It is being shown in black or in vivid jewel tones, often lined in a contrasting color, and sometimes lined with fur.

It is most popular with wide upstanding collar to frame the face, or with corded detail at the shoulders.

Sometimes it has a flat Peter Pan collar of fur, with a small round muff to match.

Sometimes it has a small shirtwaist collar of fur, with matching muff.

Sometimes there is no fur at all, but a monk's cord for the neck fastening.

Metal striped velvet is being shown for evening wraps, and most effective it is, too, with metallic accents in the trimming. For instance, there is a black velvet cape with silver lame stripes, and a small upstanding silver collar with matching cuffs.

COAT WITH MUFF

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

A new slogan which is going the rounds in fashion's realm is "the coat with a muff." It is a movement which is being enthusiastically endorsed far and wide, both because of its smart style appeal and its practicability. Instead of buying a coat trimmed with fox, mink, nutria, or whatever the fur, and then starting out on a wearisome search for a muff to match, all you have to do is to ask your sales person for a fur-trimmed coat with muff. The picture shows a particularly handsome muff and coat combination which was one of several displayed at a recent style exhibit given by the Chicago Wholesale Market council. There are many high-fashion details in this outfit which bespeak important fashion trends. The fact that this coat is fashioned with a cape is significant. As is often the case in this season's coat styling, this cape, which by the way is of Russian caracul, is detachable—can be taken off and worn with your new wool one-piece street dress. The new Russian neckline is interpreted in the high collar. Silver fox is the fur, the caracul muff being trimmed with the tails.

Silks Making Loveliest Showing in Many Seasons

The silk parade now sweeping New York and soon to cross the continent, has brought forth the loveliest showing in many seasons in New York windows. Green plays a prominent part in these silk displays along with rich brocades and velvets in "churchly" shades of green and purple.

A fascinating collection of silk dresses of the past century is linked with modern silks, among them a quaint 1860 green striped taffeta with today's fashionable tunic, an 1880 stiff satin bustle gown in the rich dark green which is again so much in the limelight, while an 1888 Lyons velvet gown by Worth, inspired by a portrait of Louis XIV's sister, is gorgeous in blue-green velvet.

FLASHES FROM PARIS

Princess line vies with robe de style.

Wide sashes contrast many evening gowns.

Smart hats have cord and tassel trims.

Russian, Chinese and Tyrolean influence, is strong in fashions.

Off-shoulder decolletage is latest formal trend.

Color wins increasing approval of chic Parisiennes.

Daytime styles stress conspicuous back buttonings.

In The Legislature

Saint Paul, Minn. Jan 25, 193

The Legislative machinery for the 1935 Session is now completed, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. The Senate organized fully the first day, having its majority set-up all ready to go. The House was slow in getting under way as the majority group had not done the preparatory work which the similar group in the Senate had done. In the Senate the majority group numbers 43, as compared with 24 in the minority group. As an Independent, supported by Farmer-Laborites, Republicans, Democrats and other political parties alike, and being anxious to obtain as many important committee assignments as possible, I organized with the majority group. This group held full sway and control of all the committee assignments. I may repeat what I have frequently said before that I have not surrendered to any one group, that I remain free to work and devote for measures which, in my opinion, will serve us best. It is yet too early to speak from experience but I still believe that good legislation will have to come cross section politically. There should be enough progressively minded men in the Legislature of this session to put across a good legislative program. Whether or not this is actually the case remains to be seen.

Last week we listened to his Excellency, the Governor. He gave the two bodies of lawmakers a comprehensive message. Critics complained about lack of detail as touching upon important features. Such criticism might be partially justified. However, we must admit that all such details could not be presented in a message, which necessarily covered a large field and at the same time was required to be essentially brief. The Governor's presentation of the Farmer-Labor program was one of the finest in wing-spread and eloquence ever delivered. Of course, it bore a few political earmarks, which no doubt took well with the radio audiences. There was some play to the gallaries, which could have been omitted, but those are things which I suppose all politicians are guilty of, and the censor should, therefore, be moderate. Our Governor ranks among the highest of political strategists, perhaps second to none, not even barring Farley.

The direction of the Governor's leadership was very definite in this message, which was not a speech, which he would have used in the campaign. He was opposed to further moratoriums and tax bargainings. He called for more revenue for the Highway Department. Such increase, he said, was necessary in order to meet the Federal appropriations for highway construction in Minnesota. There are essentially only two avenues for which such revenues can be obtained, that revenue from automobile licenses and that of revenue from tax on gasoline. You are, no doubt, all familiar with the fact that the license rate on automobiles in our state will this year automatically revert back to the old high rate unless action to the contrary is taken by the Legislature. The Governor stressed high rates for high priced cars. Such an arrangement alone will, however, not provide the necessary additional revenue. As your Senator I shall appreciate very much to hear from the people in our district as to your opinion in this matter. Are you in favor of an increase in the license rate or do you favor an increase in gasoline? It is my opinion that at least the rate on old low priced cars should continue as low as they have been these last two years, since the people who use these cars are hard pressed financially and do not use the trunk highways very much.

During these first two weeks at the Capitol, I have heard from quite a number of the home constituents and I want to assure you that I appreciate such communication. I am here to serve you all to the best of my ability and shall endeavor to treat all political factions as fairly as possible. If you have certain suggestions to make as to any legislation do not hesitate to write.

Respectfully,
E. L Tungseth

One Man Army At Mankato Cleans Up

As head of the health department, the police, the army and navy, and every other department at Mankato, Major Charles K. Mayer is a pretty effective officer. Entering a barber shop in that city a few days ago, Mayer was confronted with the difficutly of having no warrant to search the place, altho he strongly suspected a slot machine. As head of the health department, however, Mayer had the authority to inspect the entire premises. In the rear room he found the slot machine, which he ordered confiscated in his capacity as head of the police department. The slot machine was the 17th confiscated since he took office in April, 1933

Addressees Look For Mail In Snow Bank

Maple Lake—Residents of this village were hunting for their mail over a stretch of some miles last week, after a mail pouch missed the hook to which it was thrown from the passing train and became entangled in the fast moving wheels. The pouch was completely destroyed and mail was scattered for some distance down the track, much of it being unrecognizable. As a result, instead of being deposited conveniently in their regular mail boxes, residents were forced to do a little traveling for their letters, and pick them up here and there in the snow!

St. James—Surprise of surprise! W. G Manning of the Manning Fuel Company received a check for $73 C0 the other day, as a payment in full of an account contracted 28 years ago. A down payment of $5 was made at the time and never another word was heard from the account until last week. The original bill was sent along with the check. The party lived in St. James when the purchase of coal was made, but now are residents of St. Paul.

In Westminster Abbey

No persons of American birth are interred in Westminster Abbey but three Americans of distinction have been recognized by the deans of the abbey. James Russell Lowell is commemorated by a stained-glass window in the vestibule of the chapter house. In the poet's corner is a bust of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, placed there by some of his English admirers five years before his death. In 1923 a marble tablet was unveiled in the abbey to commemorate the friendship of Walter Hines Page, American ambassador to the court of St. James during the World war.

WHY

Harrison Rock, in Ohio, Was Given That Name

Harrison Rock is so called from the fact, which seems to be supported by undisputed tradition, that Gen. William Henry Harrison, with his military staff, used it on one occasion as a mess table, according to the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer. This was while conducting the campaigns in the War of 1812 in the Sandusky and Maumee valleys against the British and their Indian allies. The rock was named by Basil Meek of Fremont, Ohio, editor of the Year Book of the Sandusky County Pioneer and Historical association.

General Harrison's headquarters then were at Fort Seneca on the Sandusky river, nine miles above Lower Sandusky, now Fremont. Part of his army occupied Fort Meigs on the Maumee river 400 miles away, a dense wilderness intervening, and haunted with roaming hostile savages. By his order a military road was opened, connecting his headquarters with Fort Meigs, the road passing directly by this rock.

On September 10, 1910, the Col. George Croghan chapter of the D. A. R., Fremont, unveiled a memorial tablet placed on the face of Harrison Table Rock, which bears the following inscription:

"General Harrison's mess table on the Indian trail leading from the headquarters of Major General Harrison, at Fort Seneca on the Sandusky river to Fort Meigs on the Maumee river. War of 1812. Erected by Col. George Croghan chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution."

Why "Justice" Is a Woman

The portrayal of Justice as a figure which is blindfolded can be traced to the conception of the Egyptian goddess Maat, the personification of physical and moral law and order and truth. Maat became the personification of justice who awarded to every man his due. Maat was the "lady of the Judgment Hall." Dr. Alfred Wiedemann, professor in the University of Bonn, writing on religion of the ancient Egyptians, says of Maat that this goddess of truth and justice, who is mentioned in some of the oldest texts, was occasionally represented with bandaged eyes, since justice judges without respect to persons.

Why Body Can Stand Heat

The human body can stand far greater heat if it be dry than if it be wet, and, strangely enough, it can stand far hotter liquids inside than out. For example, the average tea-drinker sips tea at a temperature of about 140 degrees F.—sometimes as high as 145 degrees. But he cannot bear his hand in water at 120 degrees, or his feet in water higher than 112 degrees. Few people can stand a bath in water at 105 degrees.

Why of MacGregor and Murray Clan

The name, MacGregor, was proscribed by James VI, for some treachery, fancied or otherwise. Charles II restored estates and name, but under William and Mary the name was again proscribed. It was not until 1822 that MacGregor was restored again by royal license.

Why Cathedral Is So Called

The word is derived from the Greek word cathreda, which means a chair. A church in which is placed the throne or chair of a bishop is called a cathedral.

How the Palisades Formed

The Palisades were originally formed of sheets of lava poured out on the surface of the land, subsequently buried by sediment and later isolated by erosion.

GUSSIE'S eyes roved over the dining room, appraising her fellow diners discontentedly. She hardly heard the harangue of her dinner partner.

"I'm getting fed up, see?" he snarled at her. "Y' can't even pick 'em any more."

"No?" she sneered, listlessly.

"No!" he sneered back. "Look at th' last twice. A shoe salesman without a dime, and then that tough cattle man who sez 'Go ahead and shoot.'"

"Can you beat that?" she exclaimed, nudging him excitedly. His gaze followed hers to a clean-cut young man, with a calm, detached air, then entering the room.

The new arrival coolly ignored the hat-check girl's arresting greeting, and left the waiter captain standing open-mouthed, as he deliberately wended his way among the tables and sat down at one near the orchestra.

"Oh, boy!" Gussie giggled, appreciatively. "Wish you had that kid's guts!"

An obsequious waiter was bending over the young man's table. His lips moved, but he straightened up with a hurt expression. The guest, his undivided attention on the menu-card, read off several items incisively, then turned his attention to a letter.

Gussie laughed aloud. "That's a bird I'd love ta get. Class, all over! Used to good things; servants don't scare him any."

"Aw, catfish!" jeered Joe. "Cut th' moonin', and get down t' bizness. Yeh couldn't even intrust a swell like him with a fan dance."

"Stick around, Joe," she advised, "we're going badger huntin' tonight."

Timing her exit with the stranger's, she followed him later into the lobby. Pausing before the locked door of the public stenographer's office, he glanced irritably at a small card on the door. "Back at 8:30. Leave name and room number on this pad." In a flash, Gussie was at his side, and with a possessive grip on the door-knob, turned to face him brightly.

"Had to come back for something," she lied, glibly. "Did you want me?"

Ah, the stenographer! He stared at her fixedly. "Are you permitted to come to guests' rooms? I have some letters . . ."

"Oh, yes," she assured him, with a quick nod. A brilliant thought flashed on her, and she reached for the pad. "Leave your name and room number, I—I have to check it."

"Oh, boy!" she gloated to Joe a minute later, gleefully exhibiting a stenographer's pad and pencil. "Now, we're all set. Gimme twenty minutes' start!"

"Are you nuts?" hissed Joe. "You're no—"

"Dumb cluck, you mean?" She smiled at him derisively. "Correct!"

The door to 808 was ajar, but Gussie rapped, demurely. The guest, John Burns, crossing the room with some collars, saw her in the doorway.

"Come in!" he invited, politely. "You are very prompt."

He waved her to a low easy chair. "Sit down here. You'll find it very comfortable." Leisurely, he drew up a larger arm-chair, between her and the door, facing her. Taking a sheaf of papers from his pocket, he said, matter-of-factly, "Take a letter!"

He paid little attention to her as he droned ahead. Better so. The meaningless curlicues on her pad might have given him quite a shock. As he finished, and turned his attention to a file at his elbow, Gussie rose, stretched herself sensuously, and with pad in hand, perched on the arm of his chair. He glanced up with some surprise as one slender, silk-clad leg dangled uncomfortably close to him, and with elaborate carelessness, her arm stole around the back of his chair.

"So-o?" came a snarling voice at his back, "that's the way you double-cross me, hey?" Joe, with gun leveled, entered the room, closing the door carefully behind him. "Well, you big mutt, talk up. Whatcha doin' in here, with my wife?"

Burns was fumbling with his file, and Gussie, leaning closer, threw both arms around him convulsively, meanwhile eyeing the newcomer with convincing terror. Quite slowly and deliberately, and showing pained surprise, he disentangled himself from her embrace, wriggled out of his chair, and his gaze met that of the "outraged husband."

"What are you doing in here?" he demanded, ominously. "Get out!"

"Well, I'll be d—d!" screeched Joe, hysterically, and flourishing his gun threateningly. "It's gonna cost you plenty, see? And I ain't goin' until—"

Burns, with one rapid leap, brought his open hand to the rat's face with a resounding slap, sending him reeling. Following up the slap, he grabbed the gun, thrust it into his own pocket, and, then, grasping Joe firmly by the scruff of his neck, dragged him to the door, and hurled him into the hall. Dusting his hands contemptuously, he closed the door and turned to face the now truly terrified girl.

"Sorry you had to witness that," he told her, apologetically. "But I certainly owe you a debt of gratitude." She stared at him. "Sure was game of you, throwing your arms around me to protect me from that hold-up man. But, then, I wasn't afraid of him."

"And—and you're not sore at me?" gasped Gussie, eyeing him half in admiration, half in stark disbelief. "You—you're not gonna turn me in?" She trembled, violently.

"How much do I owe you?" he asked: seemingly ignoring her questions good naturedly. "Here," he fumbled with her writing pad, "write it down here. You see," he smiled wistfully, "I'm totally deaf."

One-House Legislature

Some of the arguments in favor of a one-house legislature are, economy, elimination of useless legislative procedure, elimination of the opportunity to evade responsibility for the passage of a given piece of legislation through placing the blame on conference committees which meet in secret, making the individual records of members easier to follow. In general, the establishment of a one-house legislation would be in line with the tendency towards simplification in government.—Exchange.

Value of Mahogany

Mahogany varies much in value according to its color and beauty; single logs have brought several thousands of dollars. Mahogany was introduced in England in 1597 by that pioneer in so many lines, Sir Walter Raleigh. Its bark has a faint aromatic smell and a very bitter taste, and in the countries where the tree grows is often concocted into medicines.

Water Going to Waste

Over 8,000,000 gallons run to waste daily from a single spring in England. This is the great spring in the Severn tunnel, whose flow has varied from 9,000,000 to 20,000,000 gallons a day. About 1,000,000 gallons a day are supplied to neighboring villages, and the rest is pumped into the Severn. The water must be disposed of because of the tunnel and the Great Western Railway company would be only too pleased if it could be utilized instead of being discharged to waste. It is pure spring water, and thus eminently suitable to provide a water supply.

Sheep Saves Followers

That sheep have intelligence, contrary to the general belief, is declared to have been proved recently by the leader of a flock near Blackpool, England. While the flock was drinking from a canal one sheep fell into the water. The others scampered off, but the leader ran back to the canal, jumped into the water and pushed the drowning animal to the bank. Both scampered out and rejoined the flock.

508 Pins in Man's Body

As an "act of devotion" during the "Sitral" festival in Toungoo, India, a man had 508 pins stuck into him. Another stuck 108 steel arrows into his body, then drew a small chariot, containing fruit, milk and flowers, which was fastened to his back by strings to hooks driven into his back. Twenty-two other men and five women drove sharp instruments through their cheeks and tongues.

TRIPS TO PLANETS BY ROCKET ROUTE

The possibility of a voyage in a rocket conveyance propelled by radium which would travel to the moon in 48 hours, 58 seconds, has been set forth in a calculation completed by Prof. Isidore Bay, director of the Astronomical society of Lyons, says a Paris correspondent in the New York Times.

In order for a rocket projectile to leave the sphere of attraction of the earth, Professor Bay explains, it would be necessary to attain a speed of 12,000 meters a second. This could be done by the use of radium, he has estimated, but it would be necessary to increase speed gradually in order that passengers might not be killed by shock.

If the rocket-projectile were comfortably built it would have to weigh two tons, and sufficient radium would be needed to develop 414,000 French horsepower. A similar voyage to Venus would take 46 days 20 hours, and to Mars 86 days 15 hours.

Possible to See Brain by Use of Candlelight

How to see one's own brain, writes Ransome Sutton in the Los Angeles Times, has apparently been discovered by R. S. Jaque of the Jaque Institute.

The necessary apparatus, says Mr. Jacque, is a piece of black velvet about two feet square, a dark room and a candle. Take a seat or stand with the eyes on a level with the center of the velvet, then hold the candle so that its flame is from four to six inches in front of and slightly below the tip of the nose. Now raise the eyes to the upper edge of the velvet and move the candle back and forth transversely across the face, keeping it in such a position that the flickering flames makes a line parallel with the eyes.

"This movement," he says, "produces a counter-irritation of the retina; a rhythm of the optic nerve follows, accompanied by a reflex of the part of the brain. Hence a figure of the part of the brain, resting against the skull in the back of the head, is pictured on the retina and is apparently seen on the black velvet. By careful practice, all the parts of a living brain can thus be viewed—by any one who will take the trouble to perform the experiment. The period of observation should not exceed 30 seconds at one time on account of the possibility of straining the optic nerve."

Buddies in Life Are Joined In Death

Mapleton 50 years ago two young men, Robert Jaeger and John Rabenhorst, buddies in the Old Country, left their homes in Germany to settle in Mapleton. Last week both died within two days of each other--buddies in death as in life. For over 40 years Mr. Jaeger and Mr. Rabenhorst lived on adjoining farms. Their children grew to manhood and womanhood together. They attended tne same church. They saw each other nearly every day as they went about their work. They have been the best of friends, as have their families. Both came to the United States on the good ship "America" in 1885, travelling together westward to Minnesota where they were settlers. Last week, as though they had lived together too long to become separated, Jaeger followed Rabenhorst to his last resting place.

Total Of 273 Rabbits Brings Hunter $27.30

Madison--A total of 273 rabbits were brought into Madison recently by Ernest Patzer, Garfield township, the result of "just a little hunting". The rabbits filled a triple wagon box full. They were sold at the rate of 10 cents each, bringing a check for $27.30. The Patzer boys have long been known for their uncanny ability with a .22 rifle. The shells for this gun cost but little, and with their knack of one bullet to a rabbit the boys find that 10 cents per rabbit is practically all profit.

"Distance, Enchantment," Is Not Always Applied

Maybe "distance lends enchantment to the view" of the poet, but the honest hand laborer is likely to seek his enchantment nearer home, states a contributor to the Des Moines Tribune.

That, at any rate, is the conclusion of a Lehigh university investigator who has completed an interesting survey of the part played in marriage by residential nearness.

His survey covered 570 wedding licenses isued in a Pennsylvania city. He found that the percentage of marriages contracted by sweethearts living more than 20 miles apart increases steadily as one goes up the occupational ladder, from laborer to executive.

The young unskilled laborer generally chose for his bride a girl living within a mile of his own home. Advancing age, as well as growing income, seemed in the majority of cases to be the signal for seeking a helpmeet farther afield.

What great truth is to be drawn from these interesting facts? Is it that the youthful laborer won't walk any farther for his bride than for his favorite brand of cigarette? Or is his trouble merely that he doesn't have a car?

And what role does advancing age play, to broaden the matrimonial horizon as it seems to do? And what becomes, then, of the theory that old men are most susceptible to youthful feminine wiles?

A Piece of String

A case in a London police court was held up for five minutes while search was made for a piece of string. A case of careless driving was being heard, and the clerk produced three small toy cars to help a witness in giving evidence. As the witness wished to show that one of the cars was being towed, he asked for a piece of string. Four magistrates, two clerks, eight policemen, twenty men and three women in court all searched their pockets and bags, but no string could be found. The hearing was therefore adjourned for five minutes, and a piece of string was procured.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Poultry

USE SURPLUS MILK TO GROW BROILERS

Weight Is Added Faster and Meat Is Better.

By R. E. Cray, Extension Specialist in Poultry Husbandry, Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

A use for some of the surplus milk on the farm is seen in the practice of milk-fattening broilers. This practice may lead to four possible gains.

Milk-fattened broilers add weight faster than do cockerels on range. Their meat is of better quality, and in some markets the broilers will command a better price because of it. By hastening the maturity of the cockerels for broilers the poultryman can separate them from the pullets sooner, which will result in better laying stock.

Fattening cockerels in feeding batteries leads to best results, and very fine results may be secured by pen-fattening if the pens are darkened between feedings so that the birds exercise less than they do normally.

A good fattening ration may be made of three pounds of yellow corn meal and one pound of wheat flour middlings, mixed with liquid milk to the consistency of a batter that pours readily from a bucket.

If liquid milk is not available, semi-solid buttermilk may be used in place of the skimmilk at the rate of 1½ pounds to each gallon of water.

Very little feed should be given the birds the first day a fattening ration is put before them. Let the birds get hungry. Give them as much feed as they can clean up in five minutes the morning of the second day, and in the evening, as much as they will eat in ten minutes.

Not until the third day should the chickens be given full feedings as much as they will eat in 10 to 15 minutes morning, noon, and night. Nothing to drink should be given the chickens. As much liquid as they need is contained in the wet mash.

Early Care of Goslings Cited by an Authority

Goslings do not need feed until they are from thirty-six to forty-eight hours old, when they should be fed stale bread soaked in milk, or a mash made of four parts corn meal and one part middlings, says an authority in the Missouri Farmer. Green grass should make up most of their feed and only a limited amount of grain should be fed. Plenty of fresh, clean drinking water should be supplied. After two weeks, if the goslings have plenty of grass, they will not need any other feed. In case extra feed is needed a suitable mash can be made of two parts shorts, one part of corn meal or ground oats. After six weeks old, if extra feed is still needed, the mash should be changed to equal parts shorts, corn meal, and ground oats with 5 per cent meat scrap. Where pasture is good, most goslings are raised from the time they are two or three weeks old to fattening time without additional feed. Whole grain should not be fed until the goslings are well feathered. Because of a limited demand, it is doubtful if geese can be profitably raised except where they have good range.

Cutting Range Costs

Next to the feed cost, the greatest expense in brooding and rearing of chicks is in labor. Any poultryman, observes a writer in the Country Gentleman, whose range is not already so equipped can well consider installing certain practical labor-saving devices. A lot of time can be wasted carrying water in pails, so any range on which a considerable number of chicks is reared should be piped for water. Three-quarter-inch pipe for leaders one-half-inch pipe for laterals, with an automatic, self-feeding shut-off near each colony house, will more than pay for the complete cost before the season is half over. To keep the water cool, the pipe should be laid in a furrow which has been plowed up and laid back over the pipe. Once a day the pans can be rinsed with a large bottle brush, which is all the labor required in the watering operation. In the fall the pipes can be taken up and stored till spring comes again.

No Cure for Stunted Chicks

Start a chick in the way he should go—and you will reap the reward, says Miss Cora Cooke, extension specialist in poultry, University farm, St. Paul. Flocks in which some chicks lag behind the rest, carry evidence that something is wrong. Some chicks, unfortunately, are "born runts." There is nothing to do but put them out of their misery. Some of these runts could have been avoided, however, if the parent stock had been selected with care—selected for health, vigor.

Production of Geese

According to the 1930 census, Missouri ranks fourth in the production of geese, says a writer in Missouri Farmer. Geese production in the United States has, since 1910, passed completely from the South Central to the North Central states. This shift is attributed to the fact that geese were formerly produced in the South mainly for the feathers, and that as the demand for feather declined in that section the production of geese was abandoned.

LARKS ARE LATER; NOT EARLIEST BIRD

Poets have sung in praise of the dawn chorus of the birds; scientists have tried to measure their vocal powers. But it has been left to Noble Rollin, a fellow of the Zoological society, says Tit-Bits Magazine, to disclose the full wonder of this myriad-voiced hymn of Nature. Having spent four years studying bird life at his research station at Glanton, Northumberland, he came to the conclusion that the early morning bird chorus moves in an ordered sequence round the globe.

Recently, hundreds of observers in all parts of the country and on the continent co-operated with him in testing this theory. They left their homes shortly before midnight, selected stations in the open country, and sat patiently until long past daybreak taking note of every bird song and call as it fell upon their ears. The result of this novel census confirmed Rollin's belief that a mighty wave of bird song ripples around the world from east to west.

In arriving at the proof, one or two popular beliefs were dispelled. The lark is not the earliest riser, the old saying "up with the lark" being therefore merely figurative. The peewit, ring-ousel, and curley on the moors, sedge warbler and song thrush all give voice, it was found, before the lark.

Greatest Port in France

Marseilles is not only the greatest port in France, but, through its phenomenal growth during the last century, it has earned the right to be called one of the most important port cities on the Mediterranean. Commercial traffic in 1870 amounted to about four and one-half million tons. During a recent year it passed the twenty-million-ton mark.

Lowest Places in World

The shores of the Dead sea are the lowest places in the world not covered by water, being about 1,300 feet below sea level. The air is substantially denser there than elsewhere. A scientist reports that Dead sea air averages about 6 per cent more oxygen than average air, together with similar increases of carbon dioxide and other gases.

HOUSES ON BORDER FOOL CUSTOMS MEN

Patrolling the Poland-Czechoslavakia border in Silesia is no sinecure, take it from the guards and customs officials stationed there.

Here the smuggler can, in many places, walk into the front room of a house and be in one country; as soon as he walks into the kitchen, he finds himself in another country.

Along the 210 miles of one of the most complicated frontiers in the world, there are no fewer than 358 items of real estate divided in two by the border. In Ruba Slaska, a town of Polish Silesia, the frontier passes at the edge of the town, a few feet from the last row of houses.

Added to the woes of the overworked border police, an agreement signed in 1922 provides that inhabitants of both parts of upper Silesia, Polish and German, should be permitted to pass the frontier for 15 years.

Earthquake Prophet

Earthquakes give no warning of their approach, and the seismograph gives only an accurate record of the intensity and duration of the shock. But a Japanese professor, the late T. Omari, carried out a great deal of research work on a method that has now been perfected. He took hundreds of shock measurements at regular intervals in areas where the horizontal and vertical stresses due to earthquakes had accumulated for years. By this method he was able to predict the exact time and location of the next serious shock. Shortly before his death he warned a fishing community that their village would be wiped out within a few days. The place was evacuated and the shock arrived and demolished the place to the minute. Another method is to watch the movements of the Japanese catfish. When these are stirred into activity and rise to the surface, a serious earthquake is imminent.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

John Norman Called

John Norman passed away at his home south of the village at two o'clock Tuesday afternoon. His passing was a sudden shock to his family and neighbors as he had felt quite well most of the winter. He was not in his usual health on Monday but no real alarm was felt until Tuesday, when he had a heart attack and death occured as stated.

Mr. Norman was born in Vasterbotten, Sweden, November 16, 1854 and was 80 years of age last fall. He was forced to leave home at the age of seven to work for others and this he continued to do in Sweden and Norway until he came to the United States in 1882. He worked at LaCrosse, Wis., St. Paul, Minn., and in Montana for a period of ten years when he returned to Sweden for a visit. He returned after two years and came to this part of Minnesota where he homesteaded in town of Gervais, then a part of Polk County. There he married Margaret Rydberg in 1897. Later they moved to western part of Gervais where they resided about nine years when they moved to their present location. He has lived here about twenty-six years.

He leaves to mourn his death, his wife and ten children, namely Mrs. Ann Ingvalson, Andrew, George, Thule, Lewis, James, Echo, and John, all at home, and Mrs. J. O. Brekke, St. Hilaire, Mrs. G. M. Erickson of Wylie, also three grandchildren. Two sons, Yngve and Edgar, have preceded him in death.

Mr. Norman was a kind father and a devoted husband. He was always ready to sacrifice his pleasures and desires to please his loved ones. He had spent one day in school during his life and, realizing his handicaps in life, he was always anxious that his children should have what he lacked.

He was a God-fearing man who rather lived his religion than preached it. Mr. Norman was highly esteemed by all who knew him, both as a neighbor and as a friend, and will be missed by all his old associates.

Funeral services will be held at the local Mission church at 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon following a short service at the home at 1:00. Rev. C. J. Anderson, assisted by Rev. J. O. Brekke, a son-in-law, will officiate. Interment will be at the cemetery east of the village.

Mr. Norman will be sadly missed in the home and community but his wishes are well expressed in the following poem:

"Twilight and evening bell
And after that the dark;
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark.
For though from out the bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far.
I know I'll see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar."

Good Seed Is Scarce

A survey made recently thruout the county to ascertain how much seed grain was for sale, and how many were in market for purchase of good seed, discloses that there is but little seed grain for sale in this county. Most farmers have sufficient for their own needs, but they cannot supply those who must buy. Close selling of both grain and hay because of high prices, will make necessary importation of seed the coming spring, and not a few will find themselves short of hay if spring should come on later than usual.

Old Age Pensions Paid

County warrants in payment of old age pensions granted by the county board at its January meeting were received here this week by all who qualified under the pension act. While the amount, $5.00 per month for each person, is not large, it will be of material help to those who receive it.

Hans L. Hanson, well known River Falls farmer, was taken this week to the hospital at Thief River after suffering what appears to be a light stroke. He is resting well and his many friends hope for his complete recovery.

Several local people have been ill during the past few weeks with a type of influenza. In most of the cases the illness was rather severe for two or three days, but if the patient remained in bed during that time, improvement was noted about the third day.

Day 11 Votes Ahead

Judge G. M. Torrance of Bemidji, who presided at the election contest filed by W. E. Day of Bagley against Marius Waldal, has decided that Day received eleven more legal votes than Waldal. The matter now will come up for final decision in the house of representatives which determines who shall be seated. Waldal alleges Day violated the corrupt practices act in his campaign and this contention will be pressed by Waldal when the matter comes up before the legislature.

Feb. 15 Is Deadline For Auto Licenses

Secretary of State Mike Holm announces this week that February 15 is the final date for making applications for auto licenses without payment of penalty. Unless the legislature should pass some measure extending the time for making applications, the license bureau has no choice but to add penalty after Feb. 15, the date fixed by law. The minimum auto tax automatically reverts back that in force two years ago unless the legislature acts to continue reductions.

In this issue will be found a supplement containing minutes of the annual and special meetings of the county board held this month. Supplements of the board proceedings, Personal Property Tax List, Delinquent Tax list and Financial Statement will be circulated by the Spectator during 1935.

R. R. V. Winter Shows

The silver anniversary celebration of the Northwest School Farmers' Week and Red River Valley Winter Shows will open next Monday and continue through Friday, February 8. All Red River Valley organizations are cooperating to make this the most notable series of meetings ever arranged during Valley week.

Tuesday evening Dr. George Mecklenburg of Minneapolis, will give an address "Around the World in 1934". Wednesday evening, Ed. L. Lindell of Minneapolis will speak on "Crime and Its Effect on You".

As a special feature of the celebration, thirteen counties have joined hands to present a historical pageant depicting the settlement and development of the Red River Valley. From the opening scene, which will be an Indian War Dance by the White Earth Indians, to the Crowning of the Queen of the Red River Valley, the pageant will be replete with beautiful scenes reviewing the Romance of the Northwest. The cast will be made up of hundreds of characters from the entire valley.

There will be women's meetings and special music each day of the shows. Friday night the Fourteeth Annual Song Festival of the Northwestern Minnesota Singers Association will be held, and during intermission, winners of the Red River Valley Rural School Spelling Contest will be announced.

There will be something interesting taking place every minute from opening to close of the Show. It will be worth anyone's while to plan to spend at least one day and evening at this year's Show which is considered the premier winter event in this section of the country.

Next Saturday is Groundhog Day. According to old tradition, if the groundhog sees his shadow, he goes back to hibernate for another six weeks of winter. Past experience with northern Minnesota weather has taught us to expect about that much more winter whether the groundhog sees his shadow or not.

The high school basketball team motored last Thursday night to Thief River and played a game in the Lincoln high school gym with the school team from Oslo.

Some of the side roads are now impassable for auto traffic because of large snow drifts. In many cases such roads will not be open until spring.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

Origin of Domestic Dog Mystery, Authority Says

Cloaked in mystery is origin of the domestic dog. Those who question the genesis at all are likely to accept the belief that the wolf was the common ancestor of all breeds, but there is much evidence to upset this theory, asserts P. F. Ricketts, in the Detroit News.

Dogs may be divided into two types—the wolf (lupine) group which has erect ears and hunts by sight, and the hound (saluki) group which has drop ears and follows its prey by scent. It is hard to believe that this latter group descended from a wolf, because its type, temperament and general conformation forbid it.

Also, there is earlier evidence of the existence of the hound (saluki) type, than of the wolf (lupine) group. Cuneiform inscriptions and bas-reliefs of remote years show salukis strikingly like the modern Whippet. In these same protrayals, a strong dog, similar to the British Mastiff, is shown. This brings up the question of a third type.

It becomes necessary, then, to search for a more remote ancestor than either the wolf or saluki. Far back in prehistoric times, a dog must have existed which was the tap root of the whole "genus canis," although no direct evidence has been found to bear out the theory.

Until such time as naturalists discover the connecting link between the lupine and saluki types, we must be content to let our fancies play with the possibility of a common ancestor for all domestic dogs:

Serbia Always Markets Brides Through Broker

Many of the younger Serbians wish elders would abolish the custom of buying and selling brides, but the older generation can't see it that way. And the authorities are helpless to stop the practice, too, because negotiations between the parents involved are carried on in secret by a marriage broker, called the storjnik, and no one is wiser until it is settled.

The supporters of the old order claim they are put to great expense in rearing their daughters, and it is only right and fair that the bridegroom should pay for the added help he thus obtains for his household in taking a wife.

Prices vary greatly in this Serbian bride market, some fetching as high as 30,000 dinars (about $600), others as low as 2,000 dinars. A bride's worth is measured by her health, strength and knowledge of farm and household affairs. Beauty is a secondary consideration, but should the prospective wife possess it her value is enhanced.

In many instances when a suitor has been too poor to pay the price asked by the girl's parents, he has abducted his bride with the aid of friends. And as only the spilling of blood can wipe out the deep humiliation and disgrace of having a daughter "snatched," feuds lasting through generations have in this way begun.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Innuits Believed They Were Lords of Creation

It seems that when we call the aborigines of the Arctic regions "Eskimos" we are using a nickname which was given to them long ago by Algonquin tribes of Canada with whom they occasionally traded. It means, "those who eat raw fish," and is as much an exotic in their speech as "Gringoes" is in ours. Among themselves they are the Innuits, and King George in a message of good-will to the Eskimos in Northern British possessions greeted them as "our loyal Innuit subjects."

The word "Innuit" means "the men," "the people," or, as one humorous translator put it, "God's frozen people." Isolated for untold ages from all contact with other tribes of men, they believed themselves to be the lords of creation, the only erect and talking human beings in all the world, and they called themselves Innuits to mark their difference from the wild creatures of the land and sea upon which they subsisted.—Boston Transcript.

U. S. Millionaires

No list of millionaires ever has been compiled. A historical view reveals outstanding rich men but no accurate detail. Millionaires in 1790 included George Washington, the Livingstons of New York, Robert Morris and probably the Carrolls of Carrollton. It should be understood that the wealth was mainly in land. Robert Morris, for example, was the greatest private landholder in the history of the country, holding several million acres. Later rich men were Stephen Girard, Nicholas Biddle, the Vanderbilts, the Astors. In the Civil war period Jay Cook was among the richest and James Fisk, Jay Gould, Collis P. Huntington and so on down. The numbers simply cannot be stated. The graph would show a long time, sloping gradually up to the Civil war, then turning sharply upward for a short distance, then another flattening and another long, slow rise, then an incline to the World war, then a sharp upturn to 1930 and then an abrupt decline.

Husbands Outlive Bachelors

Figures show the death rate of husbands is much lower than that of bachelors, thus supporting the old contention that married life, especially for men, is conducive to health and longevity. Vital statistics compiled by the census bureau show that the death rate of husbands between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five is about one-half that of bachelors of the same age group. And the death rate for husbands of all ages between twenty-five and sixty-five is only two-thirds that of bachelors between those ages.—Pathfinder Magazine.

In The Legislature

Saint Paul, Minn. Jan. 25, 1935

Of major importance this week is the Senate Resolution, which called for a Senate investigation into the several State Departments. The resolution was first introduced by Senator Carley of Plainview. included only such Departments as were in control by the Governor. This resolution was, of course, not favored by the Olson supporters and neither was it satisfactory to the major portion of the so-called Conservatives. By amendment the resolution was made to include all Departments of the State. Investigations are slated to begin early next week.

A resolution memorializing Congress to pass an adequate old age pension law was passed without opposition. No specific requirements were requested, as Congress must be expected to work out the details itself. No reference was made to the Townsend bill, which has been given much publicity lately.

A delegation visited the Capitol from the drouth stricken counties of central and western Minnesota. The situation there is very acute. Federal relief, according to information given us, is not adequate. These counties ask for a special relief appropriation of $750,000. When this request came thru, Governor Olson strengthened his plea for an adequate relief program in the State, which would be sufficient and elastic enough to provide for any such emergency, which occasionally may occur. He mentioned a $10,000,000 per year relief program in order to match and cooperate with the Federal program. "The longer such a resolution is put off the more uncertain relations with the Federal Government will be", the Governor said. Mr. Howard Hunter, Regional Relief Director, informed us that $10,000,000 per year would be Minnesota's share. "Plans for Minnesota after February 1st, will be conditioned upon the state paying its share", he said. In this connection, it may be well to mention that Congress has a bill appropriating $60,000,000 for seed relief to Minnesota farmers. Thisbill firstcalled for $40,000,000 but an amendment was offered by Former Governor Christianson to increase this appropriation to $60,000,000. It has as yet not passed.

The Ninth Congressional District delegation has had two informal meetings. Representative Melby is our Chairman, and we expect to meet whenever there are vital matters pertaining to our part of the state that need conserted attention. There are eight Senators from this Ninth Congressional District, four Conservatives (Independents) and four Farmer-Laborites. There are seventeen Representatives, eleven of which are Conservatives (Independents) and six Farmer-Laborites. At the second meeting of this group, Mr. Arens, Conservator of the Rural Credit Department, was present and we discussed with him problems relative to the Rural Credit Department. I shall say more about this subject later.

This week, I, together with Senators Solstad and Rice, introduced (S F. 210), a Bill for an Act providing aid to certain school districts and appropriating money therefor. This bill will reimburse school districts such school taxes as they would have received if the state owned farms were private property. It is identical with former Acts of this kind in the past, and will be in force for the years 1935-1936.

One Dark Night

ANNE stood at the counter peering out into the night. The rain swooshed against the windows and the wind was blowing a gale. She wished her roadstand was on the main highway; she should have taken Ned's advie. Her husband had wanted to buy a piece of land on the main highway, and she had protested against the extra expense. Besides, her place was on the road that led to the lake. Business had been good. But tonight it was lonesome. Then, too, the police call early in the evening had upset her. "Calling all cars!" always made her anxious. Ned drove one of them.

"Calling all cars. Calling all cars. Blockade all roads leading from Bingham. Look for a green sedan, two men. Big hold-up on the turnpike. Proprietor of garage shot. Stand by for instructions. Car No. 12 take Parsons road at four corners."

Anne had listened eagerly. Now as she glanced uneasily at the clock, she decided to close up.

Anne slipped her arms into her raincoat and went outside to close the shutters.

As she struggled with them, a car zoomed down the road, throwing her into bold relief. It swung into the yard and stopped. She saw it was Ned's car and was about to call out when a man stepped out. Then another, and still a third.

"Hey, Girl, give me a bite to eat, will you?" the taller one said. He strode up to the door. The second man was more clearly revealed. It was Ned. And to her amazement he gave no sign of knowing her. Instead he trod closely on the heels of the tall man and was in turn closely followed. Anne, trembling with sudden terror followed them. She was no fool. Ned had not wanted to be recognized. She stilled the tumult in her breast and stepped briskly behind the counter. The three men sat on the stools, Ned in the middle. "Hamburger with onion," said the tall man.

Ann forced herself to obey the order as casually as possible.

"I was just getting ready to close up," she said pleasantly. "Coffee?"

"Sure. See you've got a radio."

She turned and caught the glint of his cold gray eyes. "It doesn't work," she replied calmly.

He was trying to find out if she had heard the call! Under cover of the counter, she pulled the plug. The man grunted as he turned the dial and got no response. Then he fell to eating. Anne's eyes glanced at Ned. He avoided her gaze.

If only he would give her a sign! What could she do? She noticed with a shudder that each of Ned's guards held one hand in his coat pocket. She was certain now that they had abandoned their car and were forcing her husband to help them in a getaway. That meant danger.

Her eyes fell on the oil stove. The oil suddenly gave a little glug-glug. It was almost empty. This was her chance!

"Would you men mind tending store a few minutes?" she said, laughing a little. "I must fill up my bottle before I go home."

"Sure," the smaller man said gruffly. "Always want to please the ladies. Hurry, will you?"

"Maybe I could help?" said the taller one, leering knowingly. "Need anyone to keep you company, Sister?"

"Oh, thanks! No, I guess I'd make better time alone," dimpling coquettishly. "The tank's downstairs."

Couldn't use her own telephone. Too risky. She would have to run across the road to Mrs. Messer's camp.

"Phone the police," she cried breathlessly throwing open the door. "Tell them the bandits and Ned are at my stand. Hurry!" Like a wraith, she was out again, swallowed up by the night.

As she entered the entry, she smoothed back her heavy hair, wiping off the mist. Taking a long breath, she picked up a full bottle and carelessly sauntered in.

"Everything all O. K?" she said smiling into the taller man's eyes.

"All here! Guess we'll have another cup 'f coffee."

As she stepped forward, her sodden shoes went squish! The tall man glanced up sharply.

"How'd you git your feet wet goin' down cellar?" he asked suspiciously. "Listen, Girl, if you try any funny business."

"What are you talking about!" she retorted. "And what do you mean by funny business?" pretending to be peeved. "Anyway, I don't like your tone."

"But your feet?"

"The cellar's a mud floor; it's soaked if you must know."

That wasn't good enough. She knew it, for his eyes, cold and unbelieving continued to bore into hers. She felt her face blanching. He set down his cup so hard it splashed over onto the counter and reached over to the back. The dangling radio cord gave her away.

"You little liar!" he snarled.

As he lunged towards her, the siren sounded down the road. Ned came to life.

"Get out of here, Anne!" he shouted, striking out with both arms. The men staggered back from the unexpected onset. Anna brought her bottle down sharply on the head of the shorter man. Ned was in a hand-to-hand fight with the taller one.

Another instant and policemen were storming into the shack.

Brown Swiss Calf Is 169 Pounds At Birth

Waconic--Six and a half feet in length and weighing 169 pounds, a calf, the offspring of a 5 year old Brown Swiss cow, was born recently at the Fred Winkel farm in Laketown. The abnormal size and weight of the animal eclipses all records known in this section of the state. The calf was dead on delivery, but the dam has responded to careful attention and appears to be in good condition. The calf was of fine proportions, and physically almost a giant. Dr. Spannaus, Waconia veterinarian, stated that the next heaviest calf which had ever come to his attention had weighed 156 pounds.

Commissioner Lee moved that the board adjourn until Tuesday, February 5th, 1935 at 10:00 o'clock A. M. Motion seconded by Commissioner Bredeson and carried.

SPECIAL MEETING

January 18th, 1935

Pursuant to call the Board of County Commissioners met in special session Friday, Jan. 18th, 1935, at the office of County Auditor in Thief River Falls.

All members were present and answered roll call.

The Chairman announced he had been served with notice of appeal by the County Attorney in the matter of his salary for year 1935, and this meeting was for the purpose of taking such action as the board saw fit in the matter. He announced that the County Attorney had filed action in District Court asking the court to set his salary at $1,800.00 per year instead of $1,200.00 as set by County Board and as this salary would be $300.00 more than the county had ever paid in this office he thought the board should take steps to oppose the increase.

Commissioner Bredeson offered the following resolution and moved its adoption:

"WHEREAS an action has been brought against the County by H. O. Berve, County Attorney, wherein he requests the court to fix the salary of County Attorney in Pennington County at $1,800.00 per year, and

WHEREAS, if the salary were set at $1,800.00 by the court it would be an increase of $300.00 over the highest salary ever paid in this office by Pennington County, and

WHEREAS this board does not believe an increase in salary is warranted at this time in view of the fact that a large amount of work heretofore done in the County Attorney's Office in connection with tax collections on delinquent lands is not to be hadled in his office during the year 1935, but will have to be handled otherwise with additional expense to County, and

WHEREAS this Board did at their meeting held Jan. 8th, 1935 set the salary of County Attorney at $1,200.00 which we believed to be a fair and reasonable compensation for the work to be done in that office during the year,

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that we deem it in the best interest of the County that the County be represented by counsel in the action brought by County Attorney Berve against the County and attorney H. O. Chommie of Thief River Falls is hereby employed, authorized and directed to appear and represent the County of Pennington in the action brought by County Attorney Berve against Pennington County which is set for trial in District Court at Thief River Falls, Jan. 25th, 1935.

Motion for adoption of the foregoing resolution was seconded by Commissioner Mulry and unanimously carried.

Commissioner Mandt moved that the Special meeting adjourn. Motion seconded by Commissioner Lee and carried.

PAUL ROY,
Chairman County Board.

Attest: H. L. Fowler,
County Auditor.

Father's Ingenuity

A Christmas Story

By Alice B. Palmer

'TWAS just two weeks before Christmas and there did not appear to be any material means of attaining the necessary funds for the great celebration.

"Oh dear, if John would only sell that old heirloom," thought Marty Armstrong.

Just then Betty and Jerry came charging in from high school.

"Oh, Mother, I just can't wait until Christmas. I know you are going to get that tuxedo for me. I can see it now, oh boy!" exclaimed Jerry.

"And I can see that party gown, Mother, with slippers to match," said Betty, sweetly.

"It's no use expecting anything this year, children," said mother. "Your father has made some unwise investments."

"Here comes father, now"

"Hello, everybody, what's up? Why the frigid atmosphere?" queried father.

"Mother says there's to be no Santa Claus this year," ventured Jerry.

The next few days John Armstrong was trying to figure it all out. Perhaps he had been a little too negligent in the past few years concerning his family. Now he realized that he must make amends. Christmas bells were chiming, reminding the Armstrong family that 'twas truly Christmas eve. Mother and the children were thinking of the things they were not going to get for Christmas. But Father was chuckling inwardly. In fact, he could scarcely keep from bursting out laughing; but that, of course, would never do.

The silence was broken by the jingling of sleigh-bells. They hurried out en masse to see what it was all about.

Were they all dreaming? There stood an old-fashioned bobsled. Out stepped Santa Claus.

"Why, Uncle Joe, what are you doing here on Christmas eve?" exclaimed Mother, all excited.

"I've come to take you and the family for a ride. So bundle up and hop in, without delay."

The sleigh stopped with a jerk, right in front of a stucco bungalow all brilliantly lighted up with Christmas decorations.

"Why, I never knew the Thompson home was for rent. It has stood vacant so long," said Mother, with great concern.

"A friend of mine from the office just purchased it," said Father, with a convincing smile.

"We were invited over to see it in its new regalia. But you were all so out of sorts that I called up Uncle Joe and ordered the Santa Claus ruse."

They all laughed most heartily. They couldn't help it—Christmas or no Christmas! They had to give father credit for his clever ingenuity.

Out they hopped beaming with the Christmas spirit.

Father took the lead and rang the doorbell, but no one answered. Then he actually turned the knob as they all stepped back in protestation.

"Merry Christmas!" shouted Father.

"Don't you understand? Oh, hang it all, anyway! This is your Christmas present," said father, sinking into the closest easy chair and gasping for breath.

"What?" they all exclaimed.

Then father explained it all to them—how he had sold the old heirloom, purchased the home and furnished it.

They marveled! "How could you? When did you? How did you know just what we liked?" All these questions were fired at father at once.

Father had done a perfect job. But that wasn't all. He led them proudly into the living room where stood the real host of the evening—the gorgeous Christmas tree. Needless to say Jerry received his "tux," Betty her gown and slippers and mother a set of silverware, a long-desired luxury.

Then descended such a shower of Christmas hugs and kisses, gratitude and joy that dear old father was practically showered under. But he enjoyed his Christmas presents better than all the material gifts he had bestowed upon his family; and he felt that his heart was filled with enough Christmas cheer to last forever.

Remembers Combination To Safe After 18 Years

Browerville--Editors of weekly papers are generally blessed with good memories, but K. H. Balcom, former editor of Brownville Blade, holds all records. 18 years after he had last opened a safe door in the newspaper's office, he returned to dial the correct numbers and open the door of the vault after the present owners had failed. The present managers of the Blade, Basset & Etzell, locked the safe recently and found they had forgotten the combination. Records needed daily were inside, and it was decided to called on the company which had manufactured the safe when it was suddenly remembered that Balcom had been editor of the paper before and was still in town. Called upon, he stated that he would do his best, and after two mistakes and a few minutes time, he dialed the correct numbers and the door swung open. He had previously opened the safe 18 years ago.

Week-Long Halloween

There is a week-long Halloween among the descendants of America's most civilized pre-historic inhabitants, the present-day Mayas of Yucatan. A curious mixture of European folk lore introduced by the Spaniards and the age-old legendary of their remote ancestors is revealed by Dr. Robert Redfield, ethnologist of the Carnegie Institute of Washington. On October 1 and November 1 all the souls of the dead, according to the Mayan belief still strongly held, return to earth for an annual visit and depart one week later. On these days food is set out for them and they are bidden to eat. The festival is known as "dinner of the souls." It is a domestic ritual in which each family recalls and propitiates its own departed members.

Sealyham Terrier Breed Is Playful and Clownish

With courage all out of proportion to his size, the bright, vivacious little terrier called the Sealyham, while not as extensively popular as other terrier breeds, is digging his way into the hearts of those who seek a quaint and affectionate companion who is full of fun.

But with fun, must come mischief. And mischief is synonymous with Sealyham, asserts a writer in the Los Angeles Times. He has a way, however, of building into his playful pranks, a clownish comedy that makes the cares of life a little lighter. Further, the happy little scallawag knows how to avoid punishment.

One who does not know him would hardly suspect the stout heart that beats beneath his broken white coat; nor the steel-trap punishing jaws that are his greatest weapon in attack upon vermin of all sizes, including a wildcat. He is a manufactured breed made solely for this purpose. His origin, while more or less wrapped in obscurity, is traced to the residence of Captain Edwardes of Sealyham, Wales, whose sole desire was to evolve a short-legged, smart, workmanlike terrier, which above all other considerations must be dead game.

His first attempts to manufacture a dog that would successfully bolt a fox or dig out a badger were likely met with a more or less nondescript kind of creature with no pretense to beauty nor the least claim of uniformity. Early specimens displayed no uncertain evidences of the mixed ancestry of fox, Dandie Dinmont, bull and West Highland white terriers. Since, their type has become well fixed and individuals as a whole are uniform. White is their predominating color.

Why "Lame Duck" Measure Was Given That Name

The "Lame Duck" or Twentieth Amendment was ratified on January 23, 1933, and changed the constitutional time for the inaugural of the President and Vice President from March 4 to January 20. It changed the time of the meeting of congressional sessions. Under the twentieth amendment the electoral votes are counted by the new congress which meets on January 3 of every year unless congress by law appoints a different day for the meeting. The amendment also provides for the method of procedure in case the President-elect should die or fail to qualify..

The amendment is called the "Lame Duck" one because it eliminates the "lame duck" session of congress which, before the ratification of the amendment, permitted members who were defeated in the last congressional election and who were called "lame ducks" to participate in legislation in the short session of congress which formerly immediately followed that election.

Why It Is "Garden of Gods"

The Garden of the Gods is a grotesquely curious rock formation of brightly colored sandstone. "Origin of Place Names in the United States" says that Lewis N. Tappen and three others went from Denver to select a site for a town. They stood upon a rocky prominence and exclaimed, "A fit garden for the gods." Hence the name.

How Ox Bows Are Bent

The forest service says that the use of steam for the purpose of bending wood has been practiced since the Middle ages and that the old ox bows used in the pioneer days of this country for ox yokes were bent in this manner.

How Sun Affects Paper

Government tests show that ordinary record paper loses 7 to 75 per cent of folding strength if directly exposed to sunlight for only 100 hours on each side.

How Putty Is Made

The bureau of standards says that putty should be made of pure linseed oil and a good grade of whiting in the proportions of about 17 per cent linseed oil and 83 per cent whiting.

Warner Gets Truck Going--Up In Smoke

Luverne--Warner Arp finally got his truck going Tuesday morning but not in the way he expected. The machine started going up in smoke when a bonfire he built under the front end to warm and loosen up the cold motor ignited the machine. After starting the fire, Mr. Arp went into his house. When he next looked out the window, the front end of his truck was ablaze. He was able to extinguish the blaze but not until $50 damage had been done. The Luverne Fire Department responded to the call for aid, its first call of the year.

The clock has a metal pendulum governor and a few metal pins, but otherwise is made of wood in every respect, including the usual various wheels.

Australian Blacks Learn Quick

Black pupils of Australia are proving that the general belief that the aborigine is the lowest type of humanity is incorrect, according to reports received in Melbourne from missions. Many instructors declare they learn more quickly than white children. It is pointed out that many black children appear to be backward because they have to learn English before they are taught anything else. Now, however, aborigine children at some mission stations are being taught in their own language while they are learning English, and this method is having excellent results.

HOW

WORLD SHARES IN POSTAGE PAID EVERY FIVE YEARS.—The year 1934 means "pay day" to the postal authorities of every country in the world, for only once in every five years does each country receive payment for the delivery of foreign mail, says Pathfinder Magazine.

Few people know how stamp money is apportioned. If, for example, a letter is sent from London to Berlin, what proportion of the stamp money does Germany receive? The answer is none. In the same way, German mail is delivered in Great Britain, or any other country, without a share of the stamp money. A day of reckoning comes eventually, of course, and the world shares out its stamp money once every five years.

International harmony and co-operation among the world's post offices was achieved only after indescribable chaos had forced the nations to an agreement, and the man who performed this great service was a German, Dr. Heinrich von Stephan, sometimes called "Father of the Postal Union." His efforts to create a World Postal State were crowned with success at Berne, Switzerland, in 1875, where representatives from 22 countries met and decided on a Postal League of Nations. Today each country sends in its accounts and claims for stamp money to the International Bureau of the General Postal Union at Berne.

How Red Cross Society Was Originally Started

An international conference met in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1864, to devise a code of hospital and ambulance rules and safeguards for use in warfare. The Red Cross societies are the outgrowth of this convention.

A symbol and flag were needed to mark hospitals, ambulances and the persons carrying on this sort of work. The flag of Switzerland is red with a white cross. As a compliment to the nation in which the conference was being held it was decided to adopt as the international relief symbol this same device with the colors reversed—a red cross on a white field.

The American Red Cross was formed in Washington, D. C., in 1881, by Clara Barton, who became its first president.

How Long Divers Stay Under

On an average the pearl divers remain under water from 50 to 80 seconds, though exceptional instances are cited of men remaining below for as long as six minutes. The fishing grounds are in water about 40 feet deep and the season lasts for four months.

How Birds Locate Earthworms

It would seem that birds use their sense of hearing to locate earthworms. The fact is birds find their food chiefly by the sense of sight. Their behavior in cocking their heads while searching for worms and other food leads to the belief that the sense of hearing is involved, but this gesture is merely to aid in seeing. They do not have bifocal vision, and they can see best when a single eye is pointed directly at the spot or object to be examined. Birds have a poor sense of smell. The sound made by earthworms is very slight and resembles that made by a person when he moistens his lips and then opens and closes them without moving his jaws.

How Name "Horseradish" Started

Horseradish is a native of eastern Europe and is supposed to have received its name because the word horse was frequently used to denote a large, strong or coarse variety of plants or fruits. Hence, a coarse variety of radish. Horseradish was widely used by the Germans of the middle ages which caused the French to call it "moutarde des Allemands" which when translated into English means German mustard.—Pathfinder Magazine

Shell Explodes In Stove--Misses Child

Worthington—A .22 rifle bullet exploding in a stove grazed the temple of the 4 1 2 months old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence McCoy Sunday at their home at 839 Tenth street. Mrs. McCoy was seated near the range in the kitchen, holding the child. She had just moved slightly -a move that saved the boy's life as the bullet would have struck him squarely in the forehead in his former position. Immediately after the explosion the child started crying and it was seen that there was a scratch on his temple.

POULTRY

DISEASE IS FOUND IN POULTRY YARDS

Rotation or Cropping Will Prove Helpful.

By Dr. Robert Graham, Chief in Animal Pathology, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

Disease organisms, worms and coccidiosis germs which are found in contaminated soil and constitute the greatest menace to poultry production can be controlled only by proper management, including the rotation or cropping of poultry yards.

No medicine will correct the ailments caused by "chicken sick" ground, notwithstanding the claims of remedy venders to the contrary.

All intestinal and parasitic diseases of chickens, as well as contagious germs such as coccidiosis, are spread by the droppings of infected fowls. Thus the soil of many poultry yards becomes an incubator or seed bed for the propagation and spread of these diseases.

To overcome the development of disease germs, poultrymen who hope to reap a profit from their efforts must rear their chicks on clean ground and plow, cultivate and crop the old chicken yards. Rotation of the poultry range so that it is used but once in every four years is a profitable practice on farms where this can be done.

In cases where extensive rotation of the poultry range is not possible, keeping the chickens out of the yard until the ground can be plowed and a new seeding gets well started is helpful. For summer planting, a combination of oats and rape makes a satisfactory mixture. An ordinary farm disc is probably the most satisfactory tool to use in working the poultry yard, although a plow may do just as well. The latter implement, however, tends to bring to the surface the contamination which has been plowed under the previous year.

Clean Incubator Before It Is Placed in Storage

At the close of the hatching season, when we are in the rush work of caring for brooder chicks, feeding the growing flock, with possibly garden work or perhaps bees to care for, we are apt to overlook the necessity of cleaning and properly caring for the incubator before storing it away. A little carelessness at this time may mean delay and expense at the beginning of next hatching season, says a poultryman in the Indiana Farmer's Guide.

As soon as the last hatching is over it is time to prepare the incubator for storing. Drain the pipes, if the incubator is a hot water machine; and be sure that all the water drains out. Clean the lamp flues, and boil the burner in soda water. Brush out the egg trays and the nursery trays, cleaning them thoroughly of down and dirt. Wire screen may be washed in lukewarm soapsuds. After the machine has been thoroughly cleaned inside and outside, spray all the interior parts with some good disinfectant, then store in a dry, safe place until needed again, when it will be ready for duty without delay or unnecessary expense.

Using Feed Troughs

Small feed troughs are more desirable than the large hopper-type of feeders. With the small trough-type of feeders fresh feed is put out several times a week, which the birds will eat better than stale feed in the large type of feeder. Plenty of feeding and watering space is conducive to good production. A trough 4 feet long at which the birds can feed from both sides will feed 30 hens. At least three feeders 4 feet long should be allowed for each 100 birds. One-half inch of drinking space is allowed per hen. Grain can best be fed in a trough when trouble is experienced in keeping the litter clean. Both Leghorns and dual purpose breeds are trough fed thin grains at the University of Arkansas College of Agriculture at Fayette. The grain is fed twice a day regulating the amount of grain given. The system of feeding grain is more satisfactory than feeding grain in dirty litter.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Poultry Notes

In the summer time, geese must have access to shade and plenty of water, as they cannot stand the hot sun.

* * *

Georgia figures its annual poultry production at $40,000,000, live stock $72,250,000, and dairy products at $20,000,000.

* * *

People of the United States eat about an average of three-fourths of an egg apiece each day, while Canadians average one egg a day.

* * *

From five to five and a half months are required for a Leghorn to reach laying age.

* * *

If one is feeding milk (liquid) to his chicks he must be careful about flies. Flies are the intermediate host for tapeworms, and where there are flies there are apt to be tapeworms.

* * *

Hatcherymen pay $15,000,000 for the eggs they use, 6,250 carloads of them. This price represents a premium of $6,000,000 over the price of regular market eggs.

WHY

Black Sheep's Blood Is Lying Dormant in Breeds

Frequently we hear the question raised "why do we still have black sheep when we have worked continuously to get rid of them?"

An instance from New Zealand may be of interest.

In an area of some 800 acres of very rough land in the Hawkes bay section a few sheep were allowed to breed unmolested for a few years owing to the extreme trouble in driving them out to be sheared. These sheep were all pure Merinos and due to a series of deep ravines had divided themselves into five bands. When the sheep were finally driven out, it was discerned that band No. 1 containing 100 head had 25 black, two piebalds, the remainder white. Lot No. 2 of 40 head had 18 black, remainder white Lot No. 3 of 50 head had over half black. Lot No. 4 of 16 head were all black. Lot No. 5 of 16 head had two or three piebalds, rest black.

Lots Nos. 3 and 5 were to be found on the right and left of lot No. 4 which was entirely black and it was thought that possibly rams from lot four had entered these flocks to a greater extent than in lots one and two. The time in which this was accomplished was not to exceed a dozen years and demonstrates the remarkable rapidity of revision to original type when left to nature. It also shows the percentage of black blood lying dormant in at least some families of Merinos.—The Sheep Breeder.

Why British Soldier Is Dubbed "Tommy Atkins"

There is no legend or historical event attached to the name "Tommy Atkins." It used to be the custom of the English war department to supply every British soldier with a small pocket manual. In this manual was entered the name, the age, date of enlistment, length of service, the wounds, and the medals of honor of the individual soldier.

The war office in sending out forms for information used the hypothetical name "Tommy Atkins." In this way "Tommy Atkins" was used to designate any British soldier. The title is often shortened to just the first name.

The British soldier under the name "Tommy Atkins" was made famous by Rudyard Kipling's "Barrack Room Ballads" of which the best known is "Tommy."

Why Perpetual Motion Is Impossible

The law of the conservation of energy is an absolute barrier to all schemes for obtaining by mechanical means what is called perpetual motion, or a machine which will do an amount of work greater than the equivalent of the energy, whether of heat, of chemical combination, of electricity or mechanical energy that is put into it.

Why Called "Blue-Stocking"

A learned woman has for long been termed a "blue-stocking." Why? In the year 1400 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed in Venice, distinguished by the color of their stockings, and called della calza. It lasted there for a century, and when it appeared in Paris became the rage among learned ladies. A leader of intellectual society in Eighteenth-century London displayed the badge of the Bas-bleu club at her Portman Square assemblies, and her male guests sometimes appeared in stockings of blue worsted instead of the conventional black silk. Thus her circle was nicknamed the "blue-stockings," a name afterwards applied more particularly to learned ladies.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Why Third Reich Is So Called

The word Reich means government and the Third Reich means the third system of government established since the founding of the German empire. After the World war the republic was founded, with President Ebert at its head, succeeded after his death by President Von Hindenberg. The Nazi government, under Adolf Hitler, is an entire reversal of the policy of either of the first two systems, and is termed the Third Reich.

Why Amulet Is Used

The world's most interesting amulet is used, not as a protection against witchcraft, disease or hard luck, but as a safeguard against the allurement of women. It is worn by the Buddhist priests in the monasteries in the Kalmuck area of Russia and its center is composed of the teeth of infants.—Collier's Weekly.

Why It Is "Jay Hawk" State

An irregular soldier belonging to a band of anti-slavery guerrillas active before and during the Civil war, particularly in Kansas and Missouri, was called a Jay Hawk. Kansas got its nickname on this account.

Why Gasoline Trucks Drag Chain

A chain is allowed to drag on the ground from gasoline and oil trucks to conduct to the ground static which accumulates while the trucks are moving and thereby prevents ignition of the gasoline.

Why Crystal Is So Called

The term is derived from a Greek word meaning hard crust or ice, and was applied at least 400 B. C. to a material which the Greeks supposed was a hard, durable form of frozen water.

Why Cats Purr

The vibration of certain auxiliary cords in the head while breathing causes the cat to make a purring sound.

Automatic Screen Guards Gems

Bandits who make a specialty of robbing jewelry shops by smashing windows and scooping up the display are being foiled in London by the use of steel shutters which automatically slip into place over the gems the instant a window is broken. At the same time the shutter glides over the jewels a siren sounds while the trays of jewels vanish, being pulled from the window by another automatic mechanism. The device employs an electric eye or photo-electric cell which projects a sheet of light instead of a beam. When the window is broken, this sheet of light is interrupted and this causes a relay to operate an electric motor which moves the steel shutter and sounds the alarm.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Now Air Conditioning

The electric fan brought about a striking change of summer climates in buildings all over the world. Far greater changes are now in progress, says Nature Magazine. The art of air-conditioning, which originated in the early years of the present century, was for a long time applied only to the task of keeping the air of factories and workshops at the right temperature and humidity for certain industrial operations. Its first applications were in the textile industries. The idea of making indoor atmospheres comfortable and wholesome for human beings came later.

Salvation Army Glass House

A veritable glass house, known in Paris as the "Refuge City" is one of the most modern buildings which the Salvation Army has erected anywhere in the world. Built to the design of two distinguished French architects, it appears as a huge glass house with a vast roof garden. It was recently inaugurated. It is described as a "welfare factory," fitted with everything which the poor and needy may require from food and medical attention to comforts and work.

Expect Messiah to Return

Several Americans have made extensive preparations for the return of the Prophets and the Messiah, writes Mrs. P. M. Ellis, San Diego, Calif., in Collier's Weekly. Outstanding among them is a man in California who has built and deeded a large house to David, and a woman on Long Island who has turned her beautiful mansion into a replica of a Hebrew home so she can appropriately welcome the Savior. Even her wardrobe contains Palestinian dresses.

Ah, Ha!

"No, but I know the man you're working for."

Personal Property Tax List In This Issue

One of the most interesting of all official publications made by the county, the Personal Property Tax List, is published in this issue of the Spectator. The list is complete for the entire county, and provides an easy and concise method of comparing the amount of personal property taxes paid in the townships, village and city. The taxes were levied during 1934 and are payable at any time before first of March.

In St. Hilaire the R. R. Power Co. pays the highest amount of taxes, $199.08. Had the local electric service been furnished by a municipal plant instead, the village would not have benefited to this amount which would have been added to that payed by other taxpayers. Larson Bros are second on the St. Hilaire list with $151.58, M. H. Jackson third with $82.05, the Standard Oil Company fourth with $63.26. The creamery is fifth with $56.48 and the Math Barzen Company is sixth with $53.06. The rate in mills in St. Hilaire, which includes state, county, village and school levy, is 110.6. This represents a reduction of nearly 50 percent from that paid a few years ago.

Mrs. Ed L. Healy Dies

Mrs. Edward L. Healy, for more than thirty years a resident of Red Lake Falls, died Tuesday, Jan. 29, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. N. W. Blindauer of Hamilton, Mont., where she went a few weeks ago to spend the winter. She had been in best of health for many years past so the news of her death of pneumonia, came as a shock to members of her family as well as many friends.

Mrs. Healy is survived by four sons and one daughter, Harry B. Healy of Missoula, Mont., L. E. and Vernon Healy of Red Lake Falls, Ralph Healy of Anyox, B. C., and Mrs. Blindauer of Hamilton, Mont., and a foster-daughter, Mrs. Clifford Dailey of Red Lake Falls. She is also survived by one brother, Wm. Struthers of Eureka, Wash., and by twelve grandchildren. Her husband preceded her in death October 15, 1931.

Funeral services were held Saturday afternoon at the Presbyterian church at Red Lake Falls of which she had been a member during her years of residence at Red Lake Falls. Sympathy of friends in this community is extended to the bereaved family.

Buy Printing Plant

Melvin Sherva, formerly of this village and R. J. Thurlow, who both have been employed for several years by the Globe-Gazette, a job printing concern at Wahpeton, have formed a partnership and purchased the Hansen Printing Company plant at Fargo. They have renamed their place as Fargo Printing Company and will engage in the job printing business. Mr. Sherva has many friends here who will join in wishing himself and partner unbounded success in their new venture.

Mrs. Martin Peterson

Another very sad death occured yesterday morning when Mrs. Martin Peterson died at St. Luke's hospital at Thief River after a brief illness, of pneumonia. She was ill with influenza last month, but apparently was regaining strength until Friday when pneumonia set in.

Mrs. Peterson, nee Lydia Dahlstrom, a daughter of Alfred Dahlstrom of Sanders township, was born April 27, 1893, and was 41 years, 9 months and 9 days of age. She grew to womanhood in Sanders and on June 4, 1920, was united in marriage to Martin Peterson of Hazel. They resided on a farm near that village until last year when they went to reside with her father on his farm in Sanders. Mrs. Peterson became a member of the Evangelical Mission church in 1920, and was an active Christian woman. A cheerful, friendly woman, who had the happy faculty of being able to see the bright things of life, Mrs. Peterson had a large circle of friends thruout this community who will miss her from among them.

She is survived by her sorrowing husband, her father, Alfred Dahlstrom; and by two brothers and two sisters. The latter are Rev. E. B. Dahlstrom of Grantsburg, Wis, Mrs. Albert Anderson, Hattie and Alvin Dahlstrom all of Black River community and a large number of other relatives. Her mother preceded her in death Dec. 1, 1931.

Present plans are to have funeral services at the Dahlstrom home at 1:00 and at the Evangelical Mission church at 2:00 Saturday afternoon. Rev. John Anderson of Crookston, will conduct the service, and interment will be at the Rux cemetery in Sanders.

Heartfelt sympathy of the people in this community is extended to the bereaved family in their time of sorrow.

IM GIVING A PART OF HIS FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Norman Rites Saturday

Funeral services for the late John Norman, were held at the home at 1:00 and at the local Evangelical Mission church at 2:00 Saturday afternoon. Rev. C. Gustav Anderson of Roseau, assisted by Rev. J. O. Brekke, a son-in-law of the deceased, conducted the services which were attended by friends from all parts of the community. A male quartet from the Lutheran Bible School at Grand Forks, sang several appropriate numbers during course of the service. Interment was made at the cemetery east of the village.

Among the out-of-town people here for the funeral were: Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Lundmark, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Lundmark, George and Vernon Lundmark and Norman Olsen all of Leonard, Minn. Messrs Carl and Israel Thulin of Pinewood, Fred Anderson of Brookpark and Miss Tina Anderson of Grand Forks. Rev. E. M. Strom and Messrs William Windahl, C. E. Erickson, Roy Erickson and Lester Erickson of Grand Forks. The latter four were the male quartet who sang.

Corn-Hog Meeting, Feb. 11

County Agent Robert Douglass was down Friday from Thief River to arrange for a meeting of hog raisers. The meeting will be held in the creamery basement Monday afternoon, Feb. 11, at which time hog raisers in this part of the county may sign their 1935 hog contracts.

Butter Prices Up

With storage stock of butter very low, and production declining because of shortage of feed in much of the dairying territory, price of butter is now at the highest point in over four years. Butter retails locally at 41 cents and price of butterfat for this month will nearly reach 40 cents.

Pheasants Perish

Many people have reported seeing and picking up dead pheasants on the highways the past two weeks. The birds evidently have starved to death as there is little to the carcasses but skin and bone. Unable to burrow into snow drifts like the grouse or partridges, pheasants are having a hard time to survive the cold, northern winters.

Here From Wisconsin

Rev. E. B. Dahlstrom, accompanied by his niece, Merriam, motored here Tuesday from Grantsburg, Wis. The former was called by the critical illness of his sister, Mrs. Martin Peterson, who died yesterday morning.

P. T. A. Meets

A large crowd attended the P. T. A. meeting held at the school building Friday night. The one-act play "Meeting of the Anti-Gossip Club", put on by a group of local men, dressed in women's costumes, was a very laughable sketch, and won hearty applause. Another very good feature was the Rythmn Band, consisting entirely of grade pupils, with Sydney Roy as bandmaster. The little folks did remarkably well with their makeshift instruments, and received a good round of applause. Lunch was served following the program.

Power Lines Break

Weighted down by a heavy coating of frost until they appeared ten times normal size, power transmission lines between here and Red Lake Falls and from there on to Grand Forks gave way under the weight strain Thursday.

This place was without electric light and power most of Thursday, Thursday night and Friday. Repair crews sent out from Grand Forks worked unceasingly to repair the numerous breaks, and succeeded in getting most of the work done by Saturday morning. Warm weather setting in Friday morning thawed the frost coverings, and lines are now clear again. This is the first instance when power was shut off for such a length of time since the line was first installed here in 1914.

Accepts New Position

Miss Edith B. Dahl, who has taught in the village schools at Big Fork, Mont., the past few years, recently resigned that position to accept another in the city schools at Kalispell, Mont. At present she will be employed in the elementary division, but next fall will be assigned to junier high school work. Miss Dahl's many friends "back home" will rejoice with her in her good fortune which includes work in a larger town as well as a nice increase in salary.

License Date Extended

The state senate has adopted a bill extending time for payment of auto licenses from Feb 15 to March 15. Similar action is expected to be taken in the house, and is practically certain to pass. Another bill provides that 1934 auto license plates may be used until April 15 providing application for license has been made on or prior to March 15. No agreement has been reached in matter of reduction in license fees. It is very likely, however, some of the older models of cars may be taxed on approximately the same basis as they have been the past two years.

Would Sell State Farms

A plan for quick liquidation of all farms owned by the state Rural Credit Bureau is proposed in a bill introduced in the state senate this week by Sen. A. J. Rockne. The bill would allow sales of land owned by the state for less than the state had invested in it. A method is also provided for scaling down the amount of debts owned by farmers who are still in possession of their farms. Object of the bill is to encourage delinquents to make payments, and get the propetry back on the tax rolls.

Annual Creamery Meet

Annal meeting of stockholders of the St. Hilaire Co-op Creamery Association and election of officers for the ensuing year, was held Monday afternoon at the Young & Olsen hall. Annual report of the secretary shows the creamery had a very successful and profitable year during 1934, and indications point to an even better record for this year. Mr Ommodt, field man for this district of Land O'Lakes, was present and gave an interesting talk.

At election, all members of the board were re-elected. Emil Larson, will serve as president, Anton Johnson as vice president, and John Maakrud as director, all in different positions than those they had. F. S. Erdmann, secretary and W. P. Wilson, treasurer, were re-elected.

Following the meeting everybody in attendance was invited to partake of lunch served by the Methodist Ladies Aid, as guest of the Association.

Too bad the electric light and power could not have been shut off a few days before light bills were paid. There would be less complaints by patrons on amounts of their bills.

The weather man evidently figured he had meted out enough punishment in way of cold weather during January so he started this month with above freezing temperature all day Friday.

Don't take any chances letting the coal supply run out or neglect to have a good supply of wood on hand in belief that spring is at hand. The groundhog saw his shadow Saturday so spring will likely be along about April 1st, as usual.

We cannot be impressed with propaganda intended to promote bigger auto and gas taxes because other states have higher rates than our own. The only valid reason for asking for the higher rates is that there is absolute need for such increase and that the money received will be spent for road building and not wasted in political maneuvering.:-Roseau Times Region.

Mosquitoes Hatch At 15 Below Zero

Olivia—Refusing to stay in a state of hibernation even when the temperature stands at 15 degrees below zero, mosquitoes are hatching out in a heated water tank on a farm near Blomkest. The mosquitoes were first noticed in the stock tank one morning recently. When the tank was opened, several of the dipterous insects flew up to brave a cold northwest wind, but immediately froze and dropped. Closer examination of the frozen insects convinced Mr. Young, the owner of the farm, that they were just plain mosquitoes. Many more were found in the tank, some already hatched and others ready to fly. Fresh water is pumped into the tank twice daily. The tank is entirely covered and the heater is started every morning and evening.

Large Stomach in Dogs

Dogs often eat as much if not more food than their masters because they have a much larger stomach capacity. The stomach of a 40-pound dog can hold at least three times as much as that of a 150-pound man.—Dr. C. M. Dibbell, Allentown, Pa., in Collier's Weekly.

REWARD OF MERIT

By WILLIAM H. LEACH

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

ALL Crawfordsville had crowded into the little town hall for the homecoming celebration. The dignitaries of the occasion were organizing at the entrance for the march to the platform. There, village officials and the local preachers crowded around the speaker of the day, eager to be recognized as part of the essentials.

The platform was empty save for the chairs carefully arranged and one man who sat at one end. He was a huge hulk of a fellow, dressed in a well worn doughboy uniform with a decoration on his breast. A pair of large dark glasses covered his eyes.

The speaker noticed him and turned to the chairman in inquiry.

"Soldier of the World war," he explained. "The only one we have who won a croix de guerre."

"Blind?

"Blind as a bat, and stone deaf."

"How did he get his decoration?"

The chairman brought up his hands in indication of ignorance.

"In fact, I don't know much about him. No one does. One of the papers got hold of him some way and we brought him in for the celebration. Eager to come, too, when we finally got the message across to him."

"Ump! Too bad," the speaker, evidently relieved that he would have little competition for attention, turned back to his group and they marched to their positions. It was a great day for Crawfordsville.

But it was a greater day for Peter Kelly.

He might be blind as a bat and deaf as a post but his imagination was seeing wonderful sights on this day. His mind surveyed twenty years in a second. He saw plenty and famine, wars and peace, pain and joy, love and hate. But above all these rather petty things—petty to him just now—he saw one great ideal of human service; he saw the justification of a life-long ambition which had been handled roughly but now came to claim its own.

It was just twenty years before that he had stood on the platform of the village school of Crawfordsville and received his diploma.

Senator Harrington had addressed the class which was graduating. His subject had been "The Compensation of Public Service." He recounted the story of his own life, telling of the rise of the barefoot boy to a position of great responsibility.

Young Kelly had eagerly listened to each word. He could still recall, word for word, parts of that great address.

"My young gentlemen," the senator had said, "there is but one rule to a successful and happy life. That is the standard of unselfish service. All other things fail. All that glistens is not gold. But it is written in the very lifeblood of the universe that the man who serves his fellow men will be smiled upon by the gods. The law of service never fails. The reward of sacrificial living may be long delayed—the mills of gods grind slowly—but the reward is inevitable. Sooner or later his fellow citizens will call him from his humble abode of labor and place the crown of public esteem upon his brow. Some day he may stand, as I stand here, before those whom he has served, beloved and respected by all. His words then will be the golden apples of advice which they consume with eagerness and affection."

From that day Peter Kelly began to live.

Of course he had to start in a rather lowly capacity.

He got a job as timekeeper in the local woolen mills, but the opportunities for service are present in a place as common as that. He found himself lending aid to the families of those who toiled. More than once he paid the doctor bills for some hard-pressed toiler. The men took the money and smiled at what they considered his naive philosophy. They thought that it was the bunk. But the mills of gods grind slowly. He could afford to wait.

Then h—ll broke out on earth and the World war was on. Pete kissed his old father and mother goodbye and joined the first contingent of volunteers in the county. For a time he really tasted the sweets of public esteem.

There were parties, dinners and pretty girls.

In the fever of the moment he married one who swore that she would be faithful to him till death and he marched away with a proud and happy heart.

War was not all that he expected it to be.

Where he looked for idealism he fought lice and muddy trenches, profanity, dirty stories, fights and sex. But he kept the flame of idealism high. His heart had been touched in a way that the others could not understand.

He was fighting for democracy—fighting that wars should be no more—fighting to go back to Fanny and hear her words of approval.

Then one day he woke up in the hospital.

His eyes were bandaged. He felt the smooth hands of the nurses as they moved and washed him. He did not hear their voices, so he learned that he was deaf. When the bandages were being changed he found that he could not see.

He was blind.

What a penalty to pay in the fight for democracy.

One day they stood him up in a line and some one pinned a medal to his breast and kissed him on the cheek.

Afterwards it dawned upon him that he had been honored.

But there had been no thrill. It was all a part of military regime. Then they brought him back across the ocean and placed him in a school. He learned to listen by the pressure of the hand and they taught him a useful trade—that of making brooms. Finally as full fledged broom-maker he went back to Crawfordsville.

His mother was still alive and he started the broom industry in the woodshed of his home.

His old mother would lead him around as he sought to make his sales.

Fanny, the war bride, had secured a divorce on the grounds of desertion. At least, that was the reason the judge gave the public.

In reality the magistrate felt that no bright girl should be tied for life to blind Pete Kelly to pay for a moment's madness.

So in the back room Peter Kelly worked on his brooms all day long. He worked with his fingers but his sightless eyes looked toward the heavens. The eyes both saw and pleaded. He was making brooms which would make housework lighter. It was honorable employment. There was the pleading that some day his own townspeople would call him forth and express their loyalty to him.

Every time a compensation check came his mother used the opportunity to protest.

"It's a fool you were, Peter," she would say. "What's the use of the money when you can't see nor hear. Your fine friends have forgotten you. They gave you dinners when you went away. But they won't buy your brooms now."

Peter would shake his head.

"It takes time," he would say, "but the rewards of service are sure."

Then one day two men called at the house to see him.

They asked the mother if he had really received the French decoration for bravery. She proudly displayed the cross.

Then they gave the invitation for him to participate in the homecoming celebration. Peter was to have a seat of prominence on the platform.

Thus, at last, comes the hour of triumph.

Now the great hour has arrived. Unable to hear a word said his mind draws its own pictures. He hears the speaker giving a word picture of the battle in which he fell. Leaning forward in his chair he nods to the audience. He thinks he hears cheers. He knows that they soon will be calling on him to say something. He knows—has known for years—just what he will say when the time comes.

In the meantime the program goes smoothly on. A local preacher gives the invocation A quartette sings. The chairman introduces the speaker in a ten-minute speech. The great man steps up and orates. The entire assembly, tired with sitting on folded chairs, rises and sings America. The platform officials march to the rear of the hall. The people start to leave the hall.

It is not until the room has been practically vacated by the noisy, sweaty throng that the chairman notices that Peter has been left on the platform. He motions to the custodian to go to the platform and bring him to the door.

The custodian touches his arm. The blind soldier interprets it as his cue to speak. He takes one step forward and smiles. Then in the heavy unregulated voice, so common to those who cannot hear, he begins:

"Fellow citizens. This tribute which you have today paid me touches my very heart. More than that it justifies my philosophy of life. I have always believed and still do believe that when one sacrifices for his country and his fellowmen, sooner or later, the reward will come. Sometimes it is long delayed but it comes. The mills of gods grind slowly. Let the little boys and girls here treasure these words in their hearts."

Again the custodian touched his arm. He yielded to the touch and accompanied him from the platform. Proudly he marched through the central aisle to the door, nodding to one side and another as he went.

People generally were not much impressed with the quality of the meeting. Most of them agreed that the speaker was awful. "Full of baloney," one expressed it. "Wasn't the blind broom-maker funny sitting on the platform," said another.

But the day ended in a flame of beauty for Peter Kelly and a strange spirit of peace took possession of his soul. For the spirit of service had received its reward.

Japan's Doll Theater

The doll theater has been a major amusement in Japan for 300 years. It possesses a thousand ballad-dramas, written in collaboration by 200 playwrights. Almost life-size, each doll is handled by three men who, dressed in black, hold it in their hands. Thus all movements have a precision and spontaneity which is not obtainable by cord manipulation. The dolls move their eyes, mouths and eyebrows, smoke, and "play" musical instruments with the orchestra.

Clean, Oil Locks

Troublesome interior door locks can be removed easily for cleaning and oiling. The screw on the stem of one door knob should be loosened and the knob pulled off or unscrewed. The other knob and the rod can then be drawn out. The lock is released by the loosening of two screws, and the mechanism exposed by removing a loose plate to be found on one side and secured by a single screw.

"Light" and "Dark" of Moon

Most people consider it the "light of the moon" when it is going from "new" to "full" and "dark of the moon" when it is on the wane. The weather bureau refers to a "light moon" when it remains above the horizon during the forepart of the night and a "dark moon" all of the time when it is not a "light moon."

Refuses Operation; Prefers Nature Take Own Course

Fosston--Alone and indifferent to life Martin Lee prefers to let nature take her own course, until death eventually ends the pain that racks his body. Gangrene, resulting from a leg injury, started in a toe, and has slowly spread up the leg until it nearly reaches the knee. The other leg has also become affected with gangrene, which now reaches the ankle. All the while he has steadfastly refused to submit to an operation which would result in the loss of the members but would have saved his life in the early stages. A county patient and 62 years of age, he seems to see his lot in life as a cripple and uncomplainingly and cheerfully awaits his final summons.

Pheasants Tunel Into Snow Bank To Reach Food

Olivia--In spite of everything that hadbeen said to the contrary pheasants are not a helpless bird. That has been proved recently in this county. When local sportmen went out Sunday afternoon not so long ago, to inspect an artificial shelter and "corn dump" they found that even a 3 foot snow bank didn't prevent the pheasants from getting to their food supply. Knowing that the corn was there the birds had dug several tunnels into the snow and were systematically carrying out each cob of corn. More than a dozen cobs had already been excavated and the birds were busily engaged at their work when the visitors arrived.

Palatine Germans

The Palatine Germans were Germans from the Palatinate, the area furnishing the largest number of immigrants, in the southwestern part of Germany. The emigration from the Palatinate for a time surpassed in extent that from all other parts of the country, so much so that in England and America emigrants from Germany were often called Palatines. They settled largely in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and North Carolina. Many came over in the early Eighteenth century.

Lonely Tangier Island

Tangier Island, Va., is a hilly little island with a population of about 1,500 in the Chesapeake bay 12 miles (2 hours) by boat from Crisfield, Md. The islanders have always made their living entirely from the water—from fish, oysters, crabs and plants. One peculiarity about the island is that there are absolutely no means of artificial transportation, neither automobiles, buggies, nor street cars, and in addition neither telephone nor wireless stations.

Training Racing Pigeons

Training British racing pigeons, however thorough, does not entirely account for the homing instinct. One theory is that when a bird is taken from the loft, a kind of invisible elastic or magnetic influence is set up, which draws the racer irresistibly back from wherever it is released. Pigeons of the second generation, bred in the same loft, appear to have this power more highly developed than others. The most expert fanciers are at a loss to explain a well-authenticated case, where a brood of pigeons, hatched out in an English loft, flew straight to that loft, having never previously set eyes on Britain.—Montreal Herald.

The Echometer

The echometer is an electrically operated device for sounding at sea, by means of which the nature of an ocean bed and the depth of water beneath a vessel can be determined. It was announced by the British Marconi system. The echometer is operated by push-button principle. Among the claims for it are that it will prove of great value in saving vessels from grounding and that it can be used by fishermen in trawling to determine the type of fish to be found from the depth of water.

Largest Meteorite

The largest meteorite in the world is the Grootfontein, found in Southwestern Africa. It is an enormous block of metal almost rectangular in shape, 9 by 10 feet and of a thickness varying from 2½ to almost 4 feet. It weighs at least 50 tons. Another large meteorite is the Greenland meteorite that Admiral Peary brought back and placed in the American Museum of Natural History in New York. It weighs 36½ tons.

Where Sun Never Sets

Great Britain, France, and Holland are the only nations on whose dominions the sun never sets, writes G. R. Turner in the Kansas City Times. The British possessions are by far the greatest in total area and are so scattered in the two hemispheres that while the sun is setting in one it is rising in another. France, which ranks second, likewise possesses dominions so scattered that the sun is always above the horizon of some of them. Holland, third colonial empire of importance in the world, similarly keeps always unfurled in the sunlight the flag of the Netherlands.

Currency Inflation

Currency inflation is disproportionate and relatively sharp and sudden increase in the quantity of money or credit or both, relative to the amount of exchange business, notes a writer in the Indianapolis News. Such increase may come as a result of unexpected addition to the supply of precious metals, or in times of business activity by expansion of credit through the banks. It may come in times of financial difficulty by government issues of paper money without adequate metallic reserve and without provision for conversion into standard metallic money on demand.

Farmer Refuses Aid To Autoist At 35 Below

Wabasha--Denied entrance to a farmhouse near Weaver while temperatures hovered 35 degrees below zero, S. M. Quigley, former Wabasha mayor, is in a hospital being treated for severe frostbite. Quigley, accompanied by Roy Schurmammer was returning from Winona when their car stalled along the roadside. The two men sought admittance to a farmhouse to phone for aid but were refused. They were forced to walk back to Weaver, and in the hike Quigley froze both arms. Nether of the men could identify the place from which they were turned away because of the blinding snow storm.

No Co-operation Between The Ends

Bayport--A complaint of no cooperation between the front and rear end of a train was registered at Bayport during the recent snow storm. A trainload of ice started out of Bayport with a freight engine in front and two behind. A short distance out, the front engine ran into a large drift of snow that almost buried it, while the rear engines kept putting on steam and wondered why the going was so rough. When communication had finally been established between the engineers the front engine had been shoved into the snow bank so far that difficulty was experienced in getting out.

TURN DINNER DRESS INTO EVENING GOWN

A dinner costume developed in black crepe and silver lame, the crepe the skirt, the lame the blouse, can be used for a complete new evening dress by simply removing the jacket-blouse and there you stand in a low decolletage back.

Many cocktail frocks and dinner dresses introduce beaded accents, just on the bodice or the tunic, with jet beads, sequins and rhinestones. All employed at once.

Your shirtwalst type of dress is still good—it seems to be having a long and popular day, remaining good for daytime or dinner wear.

Don't forget that daytime necklines are high at will, figure or select your neckline so that it can be worn up or low and open.

Pink and brown are a grand combination for evening. We saw a pink crepe satin with brown accents in the girdle and flower trimming.

Glossy Type Leather Is the Vogue in Shoe Wear

Smooth shoe leathers assume renewed importance, according to models seen at the recent leather show. Of unusual prominence are the smooth, very glossy types which have almost the luster of silk.

Combinations of different types of texture in like color in one shoe is another noticeable feature. Patent leather is combined with calf, for example, or calf with suede.

Heavy grain leathers, prominently embossed, are of secondary importance in the spring showings, but are still to be seen in many lines, especially in sport shoes.

"Baltimore of England"

As the largest city in Essex outside the London area, Colchester is an important farming and shopping center as well as the "Baltimore of England" for sea food. In England, too, Colchester is nearly as noted for its roses as for its oysters. Thousands of beautiful blossoms are raised annually in Colchester nurseries and shipped to London markets.

PLAID NECKWEAR

First we would call attention to the smart "lines" of the youthful velvet gown. It is the new beltless princess form-fitting effect which is the latest vogue going. This simple silhouette is exactly what women who know fashion are seeking. The big collar and wide cuffs are of metal-woven taffeta silk. The smartest accessory sets worn this season are made of metal-shot fabrics or perhaps quilted lame in gold or silver.

False Teeth In Hock For Booze

Grand Marais--The high price of whisky, a universal complaint, took another form this week when the price of whisky was a brand new set of false teeth; uppers and lowers. It happened recently when a man appeared in a local restaurant and wanted to hock his set of false teeth for one dollar. The dollar was lent to him and he dropped over to the liquor dispensary and purchased a pint bottle of "bottled in bond". Then he came back to the cafe and promoted another 75 cents on the teeth with which to buy a meal. The teeth, uppers and lowers, repose in a glass at the restaurant.

Many Uses for Tung Oil

Tung oil is an important drying agent in paints and makes varnishes waterproof. It is used in automobile enamels, in linoleum, synthetic wallboard, waterproof fabrics and in a vast variety of other ways. The oil is pressed from the nuts that grow in clusters on the tree, oils of different characteristics being secured by hot and cold treatments. It is a heavy oil and solidifies to a hard jelly. This is hastened by treatment with iodine solutions. The Chinese use the residue after pressing for caulking compounds for filling the seams in their boats.

Exposition and a Fair

The principal difference between an exposition and a fair, although the terms are used interchangeably, is that the former is rather a setting forth of objects for public view with an idea of expressing their historical, political or commercial significance, without a thought of sale, while a fair is more a gathering of merchandise or interesting objects and a meeting of buyers and sellers at a certain place at a specified time for commercial advantage.

May Reduce Loans

Some very good proposals have been made to the legislature in regard to loans on farms made by the State thru the Rural Credits Bureau. One proposal would have the farms on which the state has loans, re-appraised according to present market value, and the loans scaled down in keeping with the new valuations. This, coupled with a lower interest rate, would enable many people to retain their farms and eventually own them clear of debt. Another proposition is to sell farms to which the state has acquired title, at less than the original loan. With easy terms and low interest, this will interest those who wish to buy farms but have only limited means.

Buy Good Seeds

Pitfalls aplenty beset the man who has to buy seed, but the worst mistake of all is to buy seeds from foreign lands and from far-away states so that the varities are not adapted for this section. Southern grown seed, while cheaper than the northern variety, does not produce the crop expected in this latitude. Another warning is not to buy seed containg dangerous weed seeds. The State Seed Laboratory at St. Paul will test seeds free for farmers in any number of samples up to 10. County agents can advise about taking and sending samples.

Representative Marius Waldal of Plummer, has introduced a bill in the legislature providing for an extra cent in gasoline taxes as means of providing necessary revenue needed by the state highway department. The bill, Mr. Waldal thinks, is a fairer way of producing the necessary revenue than that of bringing auto licenses up to the level they formerly were, to which proposition he is opposed.

Probabilities Never Wrong

The quotation from Aristotle to the effect that probabilities are never wrong is a translation of the Greek which is practically as follows: "In regard to the confirmation of evidence and the law of probabilities, when a man has no witnesses he can say that the decision should be given in accordance with probabilities and that this is the meaning of the oath according to the best of one's judgment. For . . . probabilities cannot be bribed to deceive and neither can they be convicted of bearing false witness."

Most Desperate Blood Feud

The most desperate blood feud in the history of the West was the Tewksbury-Graham feud which raged in Gila county, Arizona, from 1887 to 1892. It started with a dispute over stolen cattle and quickly involved all the men and boys in three big families and a number of their friends, the battles at times having twenty men on a side. With one exception, every man who took an active part in it was killed in these five years.—Collier's Weekly.

Paper-Making

Paper is made from various plant fibers, obtained by disintegrating wood, jute, bamboo, hemp and alfa grasses of Spain and North America. In the early days of the industry, paper was made almost invariably from one of the discarded textile fabrics, particularly cotton and linen, technically called "rags," and including worn-out garments, cuttings and waste from looms.

One of Oldest Cities

Benares, "by the still-flowing Ganges," is said to be one of the oldest cities in the world. Abode of sanctity and resort of religious teachers and philosophers, it is the center for thousands of pilgrims from all parts of India. Down on the Ganges riverfront are the famous ghats, especially the Manikarnika Ghat with its sacred pool.

Sighing and Yawning

Sighing and yawning are emotional forms of inspiration, the latter associated with stretching movements of jaws and limbs. They appear to be efforts of the nervous system to correct, by an extra deep inspiration, the venosity of the blood due to inactivity produced by ennui or grief.

Hits Broad Side Of Barn--And Hired Man

Redwood Falls--Bert Wiggins has proved that he can not only hit the broad side of a barn, but that he can also include his hired man, stationed on the other side of the broad side. Recently Bert took his trusty 16 guage from its resting in hope of shooting a pesky squirrel which had been stealing his seed corn. As he approached the barn, his glove caught in the trigger of the gun, which discharged. As a result of the explosion, there are now a large hole in the barn and several smaller holes in the right thigh of Art Stevens, who was hanging up a harness inside the building.

AUNT AGATHA'S ROMANCE

By R. H. WILKINSON

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

AUNT AGATHA SPENCER AT fifty-five was still romantic.

There is a story that Aunt Agatha was once the village queen, and that her romance with brilliant Paul Shelley was nipped in the bud when Paul eloped with the widow Dawson and never came back to Dexter.

Most folks give some credence to this tale.

Aunt Agatha's features still reflect the glory of a once alluring beauty. She has retained many of her early ideas about love and is always eager to counsel youth in regard to it.

Some folks call the old lady flighty.

Romance had never again come to Aunt Agatha after her affair with Paul Shelley.

That is, it never came until one day last June. On that day Aunt Agatha had a caller.

Unfortunately she was away at the time and Emma Lourgren, the housekeeper, answered the door.

Emma's face wore a look of deep concern when Aunt Agatha got home.

"Who," she asked, "do you suppose called this afternoon?"

"Paul Shelley," said Aunt Agatha quickly.

And for just an instant a sort of wistful look came to dwell in her eyes.

You could tell that she's never forgotten Paul.

"Don't be silly," said Emma. "It was Roy Huckleworth."

"Roy Huckleworth! Whatever did he want?"

"Goodness knows. He asked for you and when I told him you were out he looked at me kind of queerly and walked away."

• • •

Aunt Agatha was puzzled. Then suddenly she smiled. "We'll soon solve that mystery," she said, and picked up the telephone.

But Emma was quick to interfere. "No you don't, Aggie. You're not calling up any men like Roy Huckleworth. Goodness knows, folks ain't got over your affair with Paul Shelley yet."

A hurt look came into Aunt Agatha's eyes.

Emma saw the look and regretted her words. "Now don't take it that way, Aggie. I didn't mean to hurt you none, but Roy Huckleworth ain't no man for you to be calling up. Every one knows he ain't right in his head. Chances are he's got some crazy notion and—and wants to take you ridin' or somethin'."

Aunt Agatha's eyes sparkled.

"How exciting, Emma! How very exciting! I always did think Roy was handsome."

Emma was aghast.

Personally she was afraid of Roy Huckleworth. He always had that wild look in his eyes that you see in the expressions of people who aren't just right mentally.

• • •

The mystery, for a time, went unsolved. Then Roy called again at the Spencer home. And again it was Emma who greeted him at the door.

But this time Aunt Agatha was in the sitting room and heard the conversation. She came to the door, just as Emma was slamming it in Mr. Huckleworth's face.

"He looked desperate, Aggie," Emma said a little shrilly.

"He said he had to see you personally. Aggie, I'm going to call the police. It ain't safe, having such a man around."

Aunt Agatha tried to open the door, but Emma had locked it and stuffed the key in her bosom.

"Oh, I wish Tom were here," she wailed. "He'd know what to do. I'm afraid of what that man will do."

Aunt Agatha was more curious than her face showed. She saw that Emma was frightened, and was willing, for a time at least, to humor her.

"Don't be silly, Emma. Roy's harmless. He wouldn't hurt a flea. Just because the boy's not mentally alert there's no need to set him down as a raving maniac. Besides," she added, "my brother Tom will be here any day now. Goodness knows I've been expecting a letter for more than a week."

• • •

Aunt Agatha retired to the privacy of her bedroom and began to think. Demented though Roy Huckleworth might be, she remembered him in his younger days.

There had been a sort of rivalry between Roy and Paul Shelley for Agatha Spencer's hand. Perhaps, thought Aunt Agatha, perhaps—there was a bare possibility—that the old love affair might in a way be responsible for his present mental condition. Perhaps the thing was coming to life in his mind again.

Twice more within the next three days Roy Huckleworth called at the Spencer home and asked to see Aunt Agatha. And on both occasions Emma positively refused admission and slammed and bolted the door.

To make matters worse, no letter came from Agatha's brother Tom. Emma, with a little stretch of her imagination, connected the two and declared that Roy was responsible for Tom's delayed arrival. She insisted on notifying the police, an insistence that was overcome by Aunt Agatha's flat refusal.

"Don't be absurd, Emma. The police will scoff at you. It will make us the laughing-stock of the town. And, moreover, folks will remember that Roy was once sweet on me."

It was this last remark, with its possible results of bringing to light again that old-time love wrangle, that kept Emma from her purpose.

However, much to Aunt Agatha's amusement, she kept the doors locked and bolted day and night.

• • •

And all the while Aunt Agatha's curiosity was growing stronger and stronger. For the life of her she couldn't figure out what it was that Roy could want.

Surely not to renew that old courtship!

Aunt Agatha's heart quickened a beat at the thought. For just a single instant she knew again that old romantic impulse.

But whatever his purpose, Aunt Agatha decided she'd have to get at the bottom of it.

She'd have to find out what Roy wanted.

She'd have to arrange to be at home the next time he called, and, if necessary, lock Emma in her room while she, Agatha, greeted her one-time lover.

The opportunity came sooner than she expected.

That very afternoon Aunt Agatha glanced through the sitting-room window and saw Roy strolling up the path.

Emma was in the kitchen, and quick as a flash Aunt Agatha had closed and locked the kitchen door. She paused for just a second before answering Roy's insistent knocking, to glance in the dining-room mirror and pull back a rebellious strand of hair. Then, with heart pounding a little above normal, she walked over and threw open the door.

• • •

Aunt Agatha's heartbeats returned to normal. The man standing there wasn't Roy at all.

It was Tom, her brother. But over Tom's shoulder Aunt Agatha could see Roy strolling down the path toward the road.

"Hello, Aggie," Tom said cheerily. He saw the expression in Agatha's eyes. "Curious duck, eh," he went on, nodding toward the retreating Roy.

"He came up just as I got here and handed me this. Said he found it about two weeks ago and tried to give it to you because it had your name on it and was marked 'personal.' He got sick, he said, of having the door slammed in his face and he declared he guessed the letter wasn't so personal but what I could hand it to you."

Aunt Agatha's heart was heavy as she took the letter from Tom's hand and glanced at the address.

Suddenly she smiled.

"Why, it's from you, Tom. The postman must have dropped it, and Roy picked it up. It's marked 'personal' and he wanted to give it to me."

Tom got the idea and chuckled. "That's so," he said. "So it is. Say, you must have thought I wasn't coming. I wrote that letter telling you I couldn't get here until a week later than I expected."

Tom continued to chuckle as he stepped inside the house.

But Aunt Agatha didn't even smile. She was looking rather wistfully out over the lawn and down the road at the retreating back of Roy Huckleworth.

French Cooks in a Row With the Academicians

It is regarded as a healthy sign that, in the midst of political disputes, France has again found time for a culinary controversy. The latest is about sauces, and has opposed the Federation of Cooks to that august assembly, the French academy. The cooks appear to be getting the best of it.

The academy in a recent session adopted a new definition of the sauce that is known in French gastronomics as remoulade. The sauce, which in every previous edition of the academy dictionary had been described merely as a "kind of sauce piquante," has now been defined as "mayonnaise sauce, containing mustard."

Great indignation among the cooks! Mayonnaise, indeed! There is nothing about a remoulade even approaching a mayonnaise, they declare. The determining characteristic of mayonnaise, it is pointed out, is that it is based in yolk of egg. Remoulade, according to the best Parisian chefs, is a sauce composed of mustard, salt, vinegar, oil and sometimes including parsley, shallots or finely chopped herbs. No yolk of egg, and therefore no possible chance of confusion with a mayonnaise.

It is even pointed out that the remoulade was defined in the academy dictionary in 1740, thereby antedating the invention of mayonnaise, which occurred in 1756, and its name was a corruption of the name of the town of Port Mahon, which was taken in that year by Cardinal Richelieu, in whose honor the famous salad dressing was named.

The academy on its accounts can furnish only one isolated definition of a special kind of remoulade called remoulade a la Proveucal, which Alexander Dumas declared was made of the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, a little parsley, a little garlic and the yolk of a raw egg. Here is yolk of egg enough, but it is probable that out of respect to the cooks the proofs of the academy dictionary will be corrected.

Thimble-Sized

Young meadow mice are born blind, deaf, toothless and hairless, weighing a fraction of an ounce and small enough to fit into a thimble. They grow rapidly and are weaned in 12 days. In a few weeks these young adults breed, producing a litter at about monthly intervals until winter sets in, when they generally cease breeding because of the scarcity of food.

SHIRTWAIST FROCK

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

It speaks well for a fashion when it carries over successfully from one season to another as is true of the shirtwaist frock. On the present style program the shirtwaist frock victoriously holds its own as smart for daytime wear. It is now being tailored of timely light woolens or novelty weaves and even printed velveteen and velvets in rich autumn hues are being fashioned shirtwaist-wise. There is a new material just brought out this season which yields most happily to the popular shirtwaist styling. It is an all-bemberg surah cloth, being one of those synthetic weaves such as is winning favor among even the best of leading designers. The great hue and cry for the dress which can be acceptably and comfortably worn under the heavy winter coat is admirably met in the shirtwaist dress pictured. An all-bemberg surah cloth checked in black and red, fashions it. An Egyptian motif at the collar ornaments the neckline.

STYLE NOTES

Season of elaborate millinery is anticipated.

Fur is lavished on most everything.

Stitched velvet hat in rich color is smart.

Green costumes with brown accents are outstanding.

Metal glitters throughout both day and night mode.

Berets are fashioned of tweed to match costume.

Sleeves play dramatic role in the latest fashions.

Urge Turned-Up Hats

Hats turned up at the back are urged by almost all our leading milliners. They are becoming with the new way of wearing curls on the nape of the neck.

Acorns and hazel nuts as buttons, with the addition of tiny pins run through them, are used as trimming for sports ensembles.

Shovel Moves, Snow Remains

Two Harbors-A generous hearted citizen of Two Harbors was shoveling the snow from his sidewalk one morning recently when he was accosted by one of the city's unemployed, who offered to complete the job for half a dollar. He turned over the job to his less fortunate brother, who made about two swings and broke the shovel handle. The owner went to the hardware store and spent $1.75 for a new shovel, which he turned over to his erstwhile employee and settled down to read the morning paper. A little later he found both shoveler and shovel gone, and he found the object of his charitable inclinations up the street trying to effect a sale of his shovel.

LACE FAVORED BY PARIS DESIGNERS

Never Before Have Looms Produced Such Variety.

In every collection of the haute couture in Paris we find evidence of the femininity and chic of lace for the evening or as trimming on afternoon clothes. Never before have lace looms produced such a variety of types or lacemakers been so successful with their experiments to find something new.

It is always interesting to follow up the choice of the couturiers in preparing their collections to find out whether smart women—the clients—find the same novelties interesting. Starella, a new genre of lace introduced this season by Dognin has been enthusiastically received by creator and client. This is a lace made on a chantilly or fantasy tulle ground, with paillettes woven into the material. The advantage of this treatment is obvious. Gold paillettes in a black chantilly lace is a favorite at Mainbochor. Rochas has done an ideal dinner dress in black with multicolored paillettes. This frock, "confetti," has a long voluminous skirt over a taffeta petticoat and a loose tailored jacket with long sleeves. Chanel has made, for a fragile beauty, an evening gown in pale pink lace with iridescent paillettes.

Another happy discovery in lacemaking is the use of cellophane threads to outline and emphasize patterns. These threads are put in by hand. The cellophane against the mat background gives a gala touch and a crispness to the material that suggests silhouettes and treatmentr not usually associated with lace gowns. Worth does a particularly nice dress in this type of lace, dyed the new brown-purple called "prune."

Dioxide Inflates Lifebuoy

Carbon dioxide gas is used to inflate a life-jacket intended for yachtsmen and aviators. By pulling two knobs on the jacket, the vents of two small phials containing the gas are punctured and the jacket is inflated. The phials are the same as those used in seltzer water bottles, and the jacket, of a tough rubberized fabric, slips over the wearer's head and is secured tightly to the body by one strap in the rear. The pockets are so arranged that the user may lie on his back and float with ease, or lie on his stomach for swimming. After the jacket has been used, the gas is removed by opening two small valves near the neck.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Modern S O S Calls

In the past S O S calls at sea have been missed by near-by vessels because the operator was off duty. Today when a ship needs help, its operator first sends a signal that actuates an automatic alarm on near-by ships, ringing a number of bells to warn the off-duty operator that a distress signal is about to be broadcast. A few minutes later, when these operators have arrived at their boards, he sends his S O S.—W. A. Tuddenham, S. S. Platana, in Collier's Weekly.

"Devil-Dances"

It is an alarming reflection that much of our modern life is composed of survivals of a witchcraft-ridden past. Dr. Margaret Murray, who is one of the greatest living authorities on that period, declares that even our seemingly quite innocent waltz, for instance, had its origin in "Devil-dances." These dances were performed by worshipers of the evil one during their ceremonies of propitiation.

Sleigh Bells On Harness Play Tune

Chatfield--A sensation like that caused by the arrival of a horseless carriage in the first years of the century was occasioned at Chatfield recently when a farmer drove into town with a cutter and a team of spanking bays whose harness was decorated by chiming bells. The bells had been timed to play the tune, "There'll be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight". All business was temporarily suspended, and scores of youngsters followed the one team parade of the days of '98.

Red Wing-When it comes down to a criminal record, Carl Wilson alias Walter Johnson, alias William Scott has a pedigree that would make Al Capone and some of the others green with envy. Wilson (or Johnson or Scott), who is serving out a 90 day sentence at the county jail in Red Wing for a theft of a suitcase from an automobile at Cannon Falls, has served time in more than 20 different penal institutions during the past 25 years. He has been arrested 80 times on charges ranging from vagrancy to burglary, and knows just about what every jail in the country looks like. He is a member of the transient camp at Cannon Falls.

Village Council Plays Good Samaritan Role

Nashwauk--An old couple who hit the ditch with their car one of the recent cold nights near Hill City and Aitkin had the privilege of being hauled out by the entire governing body of the village of Nashwauk--and seeing everyone of the council members get frosted ears. Mayor Carlson, Clerk Tabaka, Trustees Carven, Sullivan and Johnson and Village Attorney Thronton, driving to Aitkin, found the old couple with their car in the ditch. All but Johnson got out and pushed, while the latter hitched on his car and pulled. The car got back on the highway, but all 5 who were out in the drifts pushing had frost-bitten ears.

Other bids were for airplane in the winter and boat in the summer, boat in the summer and car in the winter, and boat in the summer and power windsled in the winter. The contract calls for the return trip to be made in 72 hours, but Klmek has been making the run in 6 hours.

LOCAL GIRL RECEIVES INTERESTING LETTER

One of the girls in our local school received a letter from one of our modern writers last week. The girl is Hazel Huff, and the author, S. Omar Barker, a writer ot western stories, poems, and articles. After reading some of his poems in school, Hazel wrote to Mr. Barker and told him of her interest in his work. She feels amply repaid for her trouble, for, in return, Mr. Barker sent her several pictures of his home and its surroundings in Tecolotenos, New Mexico, of himself, and of game he has shot, a very interesting letter, a short sketch of his life, and an autographed book of his poetry.

Mr. Barker speaks of himself thus: "Sneakin' up on 41, double harness 8 years, no young 'uns". His has been a very interesting career. Besides being an author, he has been a farmer, a rancher, forest ranger, teacher, newspaper correspondent, and trombonist in Doc Patterson's cowboy band, as well as a Sergeant in the American troops during the World War. He was once a member of the New Mexico Legislature.

All the material he sent was very interesting. He ends the sketch of his life with these words, "And that, as the cowboy says, jest about unsaddles the hoss!"

The List of real property for the County of Pennington on which taxes payable in 1934, remained delinquent on the first Monday of January, 1935, is published in this issue. Several auto loads of people from here motored Tuesday evening to Plummer to hear the sub-district declamatory contest in which contestants from Goodridge, St. Hilaire, Plummer and Red Lake Falls were entered. Red Lake Falls carried off the honors by winning first in all three divisions. Hazel Huff of the local school, won second place in the Dramatic division. Winners at Plummer will compete in the district contest to be held later at East Grand Forks.

Myrtle Hansen Dies

Mrs. Herman Jepson received the sad message Thursday that her sister, Myrtle Hansen, had died at her home at Minneapolis following a long illness. Miss Hansen, age 34, was an employee of the Bell Telephone Company. She had served the company as operator at Crookston before being transferred to Minneapolis about eight years ago. The Hansen family resided in St. Hilaire some years ago and are well known here.

Surviving Miss Hansen are her mother, Georgiana Hansen, six sisters, Mrs. Herman Jepson, Mrs. F. F. Wright of St. Paul, Mrs. David Richardson, Alice, Inez and Edith, all of Minneapolis. Mrs. Jepson went down to attend the funeral services which were held Saturday afternoon. Sympathy of many friends in this community is extended to the bereaved family.

Band To Plummer

The St. Hilaire school band is going Friday night to Plummer to provide music before and between acts at a community entertainment sponsered by the enterprising people of that village for the purpose of raising money to buy chairs for their new hall. A dance is to be given following the entertainment.

Funeral services were held Friday at Red Lake Falls for Theo. Huot, who died a few days previously at a Crookston hospital. As a buyer of potatoes and hay Mr. Huot travelled extensively thruout this territory, and was well known to many people in this section. He was 48 years of age.

Because of making up for days lost during fore part of the term, the local school did not observe Lincoln's Birthday, nor will it close for Washington's Birthday.

1-Act Play Contest

A one-act play contest sponsered by the American Legion Auxiliary will be held sometime after the first week in April in Thief River Falls in the City Auditorium. This is a State wide contest being held under the Minnesota Recreational Leisure Time Program and is open to any group wishing to participate.

There will be no age, race, or sex classifications. The play may be under the direction of any person but no professionals may take part in the play itself. Any group or any organization who wishes to enter a play in this contest may do so by notifying either Mrs. Claud Evenson, President of the American Legion Auxiliary, or Verna Becker Purcell, District Chairman of the Leisure Time Dramatics.

A first and an alternate will be chosen in the County contest, definite dates of which will be announced later.

Any group—church, social, or civic—may enter this contest by simply notifying those in charge, sometime before March 1st.

Watch the papers for further announcements.

Elect Superintendent

Dr. Baldwin Borreson, member of the staff of the State Sanatorium at Walker, Minn., was elected superintendent of the Oakland Park Sanatorium at Thief River Falls at a special meeting of the Sanatorium Commission held last Thursday night. Dr. Borreson will succeed Dr. B. C. Bernard who has resigned to engage in private practice in his native state of Mississippi. The new superintendent will assume charge April 16th. Dr. Borreson was located at Warren some years ago before he entered employe of the state.

The U. S. Supreme court has handed down decisions in the private gold bond cases upholding the government stand, and approving and protecting the new deal monetary policies. The court gave its approval of legislation which eliminated gold payment clauses from all private bonds. Final settlement of this matter will result in renewed activity in many lines that have been practically dormant while awaiting the decision.

Thawing weather which had prevailed about a week here, ended following a light fall of snow Thursday night.

St. Peter's and the Vatican

St. Peter's was erected on the traditional site of the martyrdom of St. Peter, approximately June 29, A. D. 67. The Emperor Constantine in 322 erected a small chapel with the altar immediately over the body, which had been exhumed and buried with much ceremony. In 323 he commenced the building of the great basilica in the form of a cross, which endured until the Fifteenth century. In 1450 Pope Nicholas V commenced the present building, and this has continued to the present time. The building was dedicated in 1626 after 44 popes had participated in its improvement. The Vatican is a palace originally the residence of Pope Symmachus, from 498 to 514 A. D.

Brainiest Animal

Association with man evidently does not help an animal to increase its intelligence, according to reports. In a controversy regarding the intelligence of the animal world, the claims of the cat, dog and horse were summarily dismissed on the ground that they learn their feats and tricks by the trial and error method, much as man learns to ride a bicycle without applying any brain power. A well known psychologist championed the chimpanzee as his animal intellectual. Then an official of an animal institution drew attention to the beaver's ingenuity. But neither of these animals, according to a group of German psychologists, possesses the mentality of the elephant. And what of the ant?

Gravitation and Atmosphere

Studies of gravitation and the atmosphere show that it is theoretically possible for a shot fired from a gun to leave the surface of the earth and never return. The bullet would have to be projected at a velocity of seven miles a second. But such speed is not inconceivable. The wave of a nitroglycerin explosion travels at the rate of five miles a second.—Collier's Weekly.

Where Slavery Still Exists

There are many parts of the world in which it is reported that a practical state of slavery still exists, including Morocco, Algiers, Abyssinia, some of the interior of China, and much of the interior of Africa. There is a state of servitude known as peonage, which is practically slavery, existing also in some parts of South America.

RED FEATHER

By R. H. WILKINSON

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

EVERY fall during the past ten years I have been driving up to Orion Oldway's place in Littlebrook to spend a week gunning for upland game.

Orion is a friend of long standing. He lives on a farm, alone, the place is a mile or two out of the village, and there are no habitations nearby.

The bounds of Orion's farm are widely extended, and there is considerable cover for birds.

The hunting is good, and Orion is a congenial companion. And he serves equally well as a guide, for during the summer months he acquaints himself with the feeding grounds of the birds which the law permits us to kill, and there is no delay in finding the largest coveys.

Orion is now an old man.

Two years ago he laid aside his gun and said he would hunt no more, complaining that his sight was poor and his hand trembly. Yet he still accompanies me on my expeditions into the woods, and seems to share my delight in the business.

* * *

This fall I arrived as usual at Orion's place on the eve of the opening day, and spent a pleasant evening with the old man before his open fire.

With me as usual was Chris, my English setter, a well-broken and well-educated bird dog, companion of many a hunt, a true and loyal friend.

It was cozy sitting there in the tiny living room.

The fire burned cheerily and gave off a welcoming warmth; the night outside had a bite in it.

Chris lay full length on the hearth, stirring now and then with fitful dreams.

Orion and I swapped yarns of former days, and I questioned him regarding the prospects of tomorrow's hunt.

"You'll not be disappointed," he told me. "There's plenty of partridge about, and a flock or two of quail. And there's pheasant, too."

He was silent a moment.

"Yep, there's pheasant. They're a tame lot, them birds. Been coming up to the dooryard and eatin' with the hens. Up to a month ago, that is. Seems like they know when it's nearin' time for the law to come off. There's one big cock, especially. Old Red Feather, I call him. He's tamer than the rest. Most eats out o' my hand. Biggest pheasant I ever see."

"I'd like to get a crack at him," I grinned. "Pheasants are scarce this year, in most places."

* * *

Orion was up ahead of me the next morning.

He had bacon and eggs on frying and coffee boiling when I came into the kitchen.

Chris was there, too, rapping his tail on the floor, looking at me with glad eagerness in his eyes.

We were on our way within a half hour's time.

The morning was beautiful with a bracing quality in the air, a sharpness that sent the blood tingling through your veins.

Orion led the way down the cart path behind the barn, presently turning off and cutting across a frost-white field.

The sun had burned its way through the early morning clouds; red lances from it streamed across the fields, transforming the frost-locked world into a fairyland of dancing crystals.

Chris ranged and quartered ahead of us, joyful for the liberty that was his. I filled my lungs with that biting air, and was glad to be a part of it all.

* * *

Presently Chris slowed in his mad galloping, darted quickly to the right and into a patch of dead grass.

I came up on him rapidly, saw that he was crouched, moving cautiously ahead with belly almost to the ground, perceived that the wagging of his tail was suddenly stilled, that the dog himself had stopped, frozen into a point.

I spoke to him quietly, came up behind him, and there was suddenly the whir of wings, and a covey of quail rose into the air and flung themselves against the sun.

The double-gun leaped to my shoulder; there was the report of it, and a bird came tumbling down end over end.

First kill of the day! First miss, too! Orion grinned and nodded. "Good work," he said. "The sun was in your eye. Them birds is knowin' critters."

* * *

We hunted till noon; paused on the banks of Little Brook itself to eat our lunch.

There were three quail and a grouse in my pockets. It had been a glorious hunt; the thrill of it was still in my blood. I looked at Orion.

"I'd think you'd still like to hunt; carry a gun, anyway. Might bring down a bird."

Orion wagged his head.

"Got kinda fed up on killing them birds," he admitted, with a hint of guilt in his tones.

"They're knowin' critters. Sort o' like to know they're around. Be kinda lonesome, too. Guess you won't kill 'em all."

I laughed. "Well, I won't kill them all on you, Orion," I said chidingly. "Leave a few for company."

"Sure," the old man agreed.

"Sure. You do all the shootin' you've a mind to. Guess you won't kill 'em all."

That afternoon netted us another grouse. On the day following I shot a brace of quail, and on the third day added a squirrel to my score.

But the week was going fast, and the hunting seemed not so good as Orion had promised.

I was anxious to do some pheasant shooting, and spoke to Orion about the matter.

"Why, sure," he said. "Sure thing. We'll go after them pheasant tomorrow and get some, too."

"Maybe," I smiled, "you can get me a shot at old Red Feather. Say, I'd like to bring back a big fellow like that."

* * *

And so, on the next day, Orion took us down to the pheasant cover, and it wasn't long before Chris had struck a trail and pointed.

A pair of birds broke from the thick underbrush and I swung on the cock and brought him down.

"Good work," Orion applauded. "Good shootin'."

"Should have got 'em both," I said ruefully.

Orion had marked down the second bird and we turned in that direction, but failed to flush him again.

Nor did I get another shot on that day or the next, and was somewhat disappointed.

Orion seemed aggrieved that the gunning had proved poorer than he anticipated; promised that on the last day he'd take me to a spot he knew where birds were sure to be.

And surprisingly enough he did this. Before noon on that day I had added three more quail and another partridge to my kill.

* * *

We started home about mid-afternoon. I was satisfied with the day's work but still had in mind to bring down another pheasant.

We were passing then over the crest of the hill. To the right of us I saw a swale that seemed to hold good promise, and turned that way with a view of sending Chris inside of it, myself skirting the edge where the walking was less difficult.

But Orion, sensing my purpose, made hasty protest. "There's nothing there," he said. "Feed's played out! you'll find no birds down there."

I glanced at him doubtfully, would have followed along over the hill, taking heed of his words, had not Chris suddenly frozen to a point on the very edge of this swale, in plain view.

"Look there!" I said, and started hurriedly down the hill.

* * *

Orion followed close on my heels; we came upon the dog together, and I spoke a low command and waited. Chris lifted a forefoot and set it down as if treading on eggs. He repeated the movement, and suddenly there was a roar.

A huge cock pheasant rose above the swale, fighting with madly beating wings to gain speed and altitude. It was a perfect shot.

The double gun leaped to my shoulder. And in the moment I would have pressed the trigger something jostled my arm and the shot went wild.

The pheasant soared out of range before I could regain my balance.

It was Orion. He had fallen against me. There was on his face a rueful expression.

"Sho!" he said. "Sho. I'm right sorry, about that. I musta tripped. You'd o' got that bird. Big one he was, too."

I saw his look of dismay, and my flash of anger cooled.

"Forget it," I said. "I'd probably have missed anyhow."

And then suddenly a thought flashed into my mind. "Say," I asked, "was that old Red Feather?"

Orion nodded and turned away, and started up the hill. And after a moment I followed, grinning behind his back, remembering his remark that day as we lunched by the brook: "You do all the shootin' you're a mind to. Guess you won't kill 'em all." And I wondered, too, if the gunning was really as poor this fall on Orion's farm as it appeared to be.

Speech Development Last Split of Man From Ape

Essential turning points in the evolution of man from lower animals were outlined in recent lectures in London by the distinguished anthropologist, Prof. G. Elliot Smith, who quoted some of his material from a book by Dr. S. Zuckerman, of the London Zoological society.

One step in human evolution was when the whole group of animals now including the apes, monkeys, lemurs and man separated from the rest of the insect-eating, tree-living animals by abandoning the habit of a fixed breeding season at one time of the year in favor of ability to breed at any time.

The next great separation distinguished man, the apes and the monkeys from most of the lemurs by the habit of drinking water by sucking it into their mouths instead of lapping it up with their tongues as is almost universal among animals.

Third was the separation of man and the apes from the monkeys, placed by Doctor Zuckerman at the time when both ape blood and human blood evolved the four chemical blood groups now observed in all human races and in gorillas, chimpanzees and other apes, but not in monkeys.

Finally, Professor Smith believes that man's final distinction from all living kinds of apes was marked by the development of precise and accurate nerve connections and muscular control which made it possible for man to learn to speak. This last step in human evolution probably happened in Africa at least three million or four million years ago, possibly even earlier.

IF AND WHEN

Rising young men don't lie abed late.

If a man's time is valuable he doesn't kill it.

A floating debt isn't a success as a life preserver.

Ambition is a longing that makes some men near great.

Every woman is a judge and jury unto her own husband.

The lazy man's pay envelope is never afflicted with obesity.

The man with a cool million always gets a warm reception.

When men grow mentally and morally lazy they want dictators.

It is useless to alter bad laws unless you are able to obey good ones.

The engineer of a train of thought should stop to think occasionally.

What can a man wear now that glitters? Nothing much but a belt buckle.

Discarding the mustache had one good result. It made the walrus sort go.

Men in general think that dressing more than once a day is a disagreeable job.

We'll warrant that nearly everybody's idea of the atom is that it's round.

A faker comes to grief sooner or later—if he is a political faker, usually later.

In guiding the destinies of his country a citizen may forget what poor luck he has in guiding his own.

Occasionally you meet a man who can remember what he was worried about 40 years ago.

It takes a smart man to run a profitable business; but anybody can volunteer to run the country.

Fresh Water Important

Few people realize the importance of fresh water for the growing stock. Water helps the chick to control its body temperature. It is also necessary for the proper digestion and assimilation of food. In spite of the fact that it is the cheapest of feeds yet all too frequently it is neglected. That the water be fresh is also important. Clean water is less apt to be the carrier of disease germs and if supplied there is less danger of disease and digestive disorders.

Chinese Official Sells Right to Print Money

A novel method of raising money is reported by a southern correspondent on the basis of tidings from Hamkang, Henghua, says the United Press.

There the magistrate, if this tale is correct, will permit a shop, or other business concerns, to print its own banknotes if 100 silver dollars are first handed over to the magistrate.

All comers are accommodated, so long as they have 100 silver dollars to put on the line. Most firms are allowed to put up unlimited amounts, in all denominations, with no question of backing.

In order to support his clients, the magistrate threatens the death penalty in the event that anyone refuses to accept any note issue. One merchant tested the decree. His head now decorates the city gate.

Swordfish Health Food

Discovery that the livers of certain food fish species contain substances high in content of vitamins that are important in the diet of human beings has probably had much to do with their being fished for intensively, says the Detroit News. Now the swordfish, heretofore pursued chiefly as a matter of sport fishing, bids fair to join the group of fishes sought for their vitamins. Cod liver oil has long been a standby as a builder of strength and a food designed to ward off disease. The discovery in recent years that halibut livers possess elements similar to the valuable constituents of cod liver oil to an even greater degree has led to fairly extensive manufacture of haliver oil.

Russian Hangman Dead

Philipieff, for several years official hangman of Russia, died in poverty in a small village in the Ukraine, according to reports from Riga, Latvia. During his term of office he executed 937 persons, 178 during the reign of the late czar and 759 during the three years of Bolshevik rule from 1917 to 1920. His nerve gave way and he was obliged to retire, although still a comparatively young man. Philipieff was considerate to the persons he was ordered to hang, and he kept a careful record of every execution. Against each victim's name he added notes describing his bearing when faced with death.

Jenny—Certainly. But you know there are sins of omission, too.

Flowers In Full Bloom Beneath 2 Feet Of Snow

Mapleton--While the mercury was still low in the tube recently, David O'Conner, Mapleton, decided it was a wise idea to dig the snow banks away from his walk, so that the spring thaw might not make a river of the path. Digging down in the deep drifts, he found little lavender colored flowers in full bloom. The flowers, which are perennial decorations along the front of the O'Conner home, were kept warm beneath the heavy blanket of snow in spite of the intense cold, and must have decided that spring was here.

SPEED OF SNAKES IS OVERESTIMATED

That a man can easily outrun any snake of the United States and possibly of the world, is the conclusion reached by Dr. Walter Mosauer, of the University of California, after testing the speed of seven typical North American snakes with a stop watch.

A man could walk more rapidly than the fleetest snakes tested by Doctor Mosauer—a red racer, which managed to get up a speed of three and one-half miles per hour. The slowest of the snakes used in the experiment, the California boa, was traveling at the rate of but a quarter of a mile per hour at its top speed. The distance covered by the snakes in the trial was 100 meters.

Admitting that vigorous and excited reptiles might break the above speed records in sudden bursts of activity and that some tropical snakes may double or treble the American records, Doctor Mosauer is of the opinion that the popular idea of the speed of snakes is a fallacy. The deceptive grace of their smooth, undulatory gliding furnishes an optical illusion of speed, he states.

No Insurance on Capitol

The Treasury department has jurisdiction over all government owned buildings and sites, including the United States Capitol and the post offices throughout the country. It does not place policies of insurance on the Capitol or any other federal building, whether in Washington or elsewhere. Congress appropriates no money to pay the cost of such insurance. Many of the public buildings are fireproof or practically so, and generally an open space about 40 feet wide is maintained to protect it from fires which might occur in adjoining structures.

Drop Corn Bombs From Plane To Feed Birds

Tracy--Credit for an innovation in pheasant feeding belongs to Tracy sportsmen, who are believed to be the first to use an airplane in distributing feed into remote places along snow bound roads. Recently 200 peck-size packages of ear corn were taken up into the sky and dropped over the country-side within a radius of 10 miles of Tracy. The paper sacks in contacting the earth virtually exploded, spreading the contents 20 or 30 feet, resembling war time tactics. Pilot Jack Robinson manipulated the plane, while sportsmen dropped the corn bombs, much to the delight of pheasants. Approximately 100 bushels of corn and other feed has been set out by the sportsmen in their efforts to preserve pheasant and partridge life. Feeding stations have been maintained and thus far only a few pheasants have perished.

Long Lost Knife Found In Flour 150 Miles Away

Hastings-A pocket knife, found in a sack of flour 150 miles away from the owner, was returned to him recently through a strange coincidence of old acquaintanceship, and Peter Werth, Hastings, is now a firm believer that the "World is a small place, after all". The knife, of unique description with Werth's initials, P. W., scratched on the surface, was purchased in Manitoba, Canada, some years ago. Werth used it in his duties at the flour mill at Hastings, and in some manner the knife became lost and ended up in a sack of flour. At Waterloo, Iowa, 150 miles away, William Mountaner, former Hastings resident, discovered the knife in a sieve contaning the Hastings flour. At one time being an employee of the Hastings mill, Mountaner recognized the initials and returned the knife to its owner, 2 years after it had first been missed. As a remembrance, Werth presented the knife to Mountaner.

Runaway Horses Disdain Motor Cars

Roseau--The main business street of Roseau was a dangerous place to be in for a few seconds one evening recently, when a team of horses belonging to George and Elmer Mikkelson decided to stage a chariot race. The team was standing in an alley behind a store, loaded with flour and other groceries. The horses tore down the alley onto Main street and left the sled tipped over in front of the garage with groceries scattered over the road. Turning the corner, they came down the business street, knocking packages out of the arms of a man crossing the street, and charged into cars parked along the side. One horse went entirely over the top of a car, broke away and ran for home. The other was caught and found to have some bad cuts. Two cars were taken to the garage for repairs.

Coldest City Raises Parsnips In February

International Falls--The coldest city in the United States, International Falls, can still rival those on the Gulf when it comes to raising vegetables the year around. Early in February, in the presence of witnesses, Dr. B. F. Osburn dug from his garden plot parsnips which would be a credit to any banquet in the land. They were as fresh as if harvested in July, and their tops were adorned with sprigs of bright green leaves, in spite of the fact that the garden is outside and exposed to the elements. Here's the catch: Beneath the Osbrun garden runs a steam line from the Insulite plant. Heat from the pipe keeps frost from the ground, melts the snow on the surface, and keeps the parsnips as fresh and delectable in February as at midsummer.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons.

Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

District Court Opens

Winter term of district court in this county opened Monday with Judge M. A. Brattland of Ada, presiding. The first week is being taken up with hearing of court cases of which there are many. The petit jurors have been summoned to appear for services next Monday morning, March 4th. The court calendar for this term is longer than usual, and it is anticipated the session will last about two weeks or more unless some cases are settled out of court.

P. T. A. Postponed

March meeting of the Parent-Teachers Association, scheduled to be held at the school building March 1st, has been postponed a week and will be held Friday evening, March 8th.

As frost starts coming out of the ground in March, considerable interference with truck traffic is anticipated especially on the newly added or secondary highways. Many of these roads will be unable to hold heavy loads, and posting of weight limits will be necessary. The state has saved many thousands in repair expense by early posting of such roads as cannot hold the huge loads now being hauled by trucks.

Shippers Meet

Members of the St. Hilaire Livestock Shipping Association met Monday at the Young & Olsen hall for their annual meeting and election of officers. Report of the secretary shows the association enjoyed a very successful year during 1934, and that amount of business done has increased steadily since the association was formed. Satisfaction with the service performed by the officers was evinced by their re-election for the ensuing year.

Mike McAndress will again act as manager which position he has filled with satisfaction to all, in the past.

Matters of providing for trucking in all animals to be shipped, to the loading station, was favorably mentioned, but final decision on that point was left to the board.

Following the meeting, all members were guests of the association at lunch served by the Swedish Lutheran Ladies Aid.

Waldal Retains Seat

Representative Marius Waldal of Plummer, retained his seat in the state legislature when the house committee on elections decided last week in his favor in the contest brot by W. E. Day of Bagley. A recent district court decision was in favor of Mr. Day after ruling on about 100 disputed votes. The house committee ruled out 27 of these ballots as being invalid, thus giving Mr. Waldal a lead of nine votes. The matter now goes to the house for final determination, but it is not expected the result will be changed.

Approve Security Plan

The economic security bill which is now being drafted in preparation for presentation to Congress, has been approved by the house ways and means committee, subject to approval of President Roosevelt. The bill, as tentatively drafted, would provide federal aid up to $15 per person for state old-age pension systems for those 65 and over. It also provides for compulsory contributions to a system of old-age annuities for those making under $250 a month, to be financed by earnings and payroll tax. With the state co-operating in the plan, it is possible old-age pensions to extent of $30 per month per person will be available this year.

Heavy snows blanketed parts of Wisconsin as well as portions of southern Minnesota this week.

Creamery Statement

Annual statistical report of the creamery for the year ending Dec. 31st, 1934, is published in this issue. The creamery is in excellent condition financially, there being only small amount of debt which may be retired this year. While the volume of cream received during 1934 was not quite as large as that for the previous year, due to pasture shortage during best summer months, the total cash disbursed to patrons was considerably more. An interesting note in connection with deliveries during 1934 was that 88 percent of all cream received was sweet cream.

Produce Evidence

After appealing in vain to the legislature for prompt action to secure feed for their dying livestock, farmers in the drought area in south central Minnesota took matters in their own hands yesterday to hurry the desired action. They loaded on trucks, carcasses of cattle that had died because of lack of feed, and others in such emaciated condition that they could not possibly survive, and drove to the state capitol. The lawmakers were then invited out to view the grisly evidence of privation and want. To the credit of Minnesota be it said, no time was lost in making arrangements to rush hay and feed into the stricken area.

Mrs. John King Called

Death called another oldtime resident of this community when Mrs. John King died Monday afternoon at her home in the addition across the river. She had been in poor health since early winter, and death at this time was not unexpected. Mrs. King was born in Slago, Ireland on June 25th, 1868, and was 66 years and 8 months of age at time of her demise.

In early years in this country, she made her home at Red Wing, and in 1889 was united in marriage to John King in that city. They resided in Red Wing until 1902 when they moved to a farm near Wylie. The following year they came to St. Hilaire which has been the family home for 31 years. Mr. King preceded his wife in death some years ago.

A pleasant woman, a good neighbor and friend, Mrs. King will be missed by many friends thruout the community.

Funeral services were conducted yesterday morning at the St. Bernard's Catholic church at Thief River Falls, and interment was at the St. Bernard's cemetery where Mr. King is buried.

She is also survived by 13 grandchildren.

Sympathy of many friends thruout the community is extended to the bereaved family.

No Muskrat Season

The Minnesota Conservation Commission recently stipulated a closed season on muskrats in all counties in the state for the year 1935. It is pointed out that the severe drought has threatened the brood stock of muskrats and that an open season would mean virtual extinction of the animals.

A good sized crowd attended the moving picture show and dance given at the Young & Olsen hall last Thursday night. Another show will be given at the same place tonight.

There is much agitation going on for pensions, adjustments, crop reductions, shorter work days, etc., in favor of the farmers and workers. All that is needed is to arrange so farmers can get reasonable prices for what they produce, and the workers enough so they can maintain a decent standard of living. Given these conditions without too many hampering regulations, the farmers and laborers will work out of the present depression without much other assistance.

U. S. A. Shoulder Straps

The insignia of rank worn on the shoulder loop by commissioned officers of the United States army are described as follows: At the collar end the loops are held in place by the regulation bronze army button bearing the coat of arms of the United States. The general's loops bear four silver stars; for a lieutenant general, three silver stars; major general, two silver stars; brigadier general, one silver star. A silver spread eagle indicates a colonel; a silver oak leaf, a lieutenant colonel; and a gold oak leaf, a major. Two silver bars are worn by a captain, one silver bar by a first lieutenant, and one gold bar by a second lieutenant.

Troy's Site Settled

There was long controversy regarding the site of the famed ancient city of Troy, but it is now generally accepted that the little village of Hissarlik stands where Priam once ruled, Hector died, and whence Aeneas fled. The excavations have uncovered nine different cities, the earliest of some 3000 B. C., and another the Roman Ilium that came to an end about 500 A. D. The Homeric Troy was the sixth of these cities, dating from about 2000 to 1500 B. C.

The University of Chicago around a nucleus of 50,000 sheet maps expects to build up a collection of 400,000.—Los Angeles Times.

While engaged in his somnambulistic tour, Braukmann poked his arm through a window, and cut it so badly that a surgical operation was required. Freak Calf Born With 12 Hoofs

Askov—"A better foundation for my herd" seems to be the motto of Felix Shusta' living 17 miles west of Moose Lake, and his success may be seen in the fact that recently one of his cows gave birth to a calf with 12 hoofs. The calf is reported to be exceptionally large and strong, and normal in every respect except that of the hoofs. The calf has three hoofs on each foot; each are of equal length, and the animal stands comfortably on all of them.

Minnesota Producer Raises 1-Pound Lemon

Howard Lake—A. W. Wildung recently brought a lemon to Howard Lake which he picked from a tree at his home two miles northeast of that city. The lemon weighs approximately one pound. It is 12 inches around one way and 11 inches around the other. There was another lemon on the tree almost as large. The tree is now in full bloom with white blossoms, and Mr Wildung states that the tree will bear fruit again next winter. The plant is about 30 years old and was grown from a seed. It is now about 3 feet in height. Two or three lemons have been picked from the tree each year for several years past, but what the plant lacks in quantity it makes up for in size of its product.

Auto Traffic Periled By Ice-Glazed Roads

Following springlike weather of last week, another touch of winter hit the northwest following a sleet storm Sunday night. Temperatures fell steadily following the sleet, and about an inch of snow fell between Monday night and Tuesday morning. Auto traffic was made especially hazarduous by the ice-coated roads, and the snow which came later added to troubles of motorists. Busses and trains were behind schedule, and all forms of traffic was slowed up. Many minor motor accidents are reported from different parts of this community because of the icy roads.

Some difficulty was found in maintaining the electric light and power service because of ice laden transmission lines. Power was shut off at different times for short periods to permit repairs being made on the lines. A day or two of mild weather is all that is necessary to bring roads and power lines back into normal condition.

Justice Holmes Dies

Former Associate Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, age 93, died yesterday at his home at Washington, D. C., after a short illness, of pneumonia.

Want Community Hall

There is much agitation going on in the village at present toward securing an adequate community hall building. That one is needed has long been apparent, but the question uppermost is how it may be financed. A community building, to be what the name implies, must be planned for many uses. It cannot be built with only one use in mind. It must be made so it will accommodate both large and small gatherings, and have the conveniences needed for both. Perhaps a plan can be worked out for a building that will suffice, and a method found to finance its construction.

The Petit jurors, who will serve at the present term of district court in this county, were called for service Monday morning. It is expected about two weeks will be necessary to clear the calendar. Judge M. Brattland of Ada, is presiding.

Most damage was sustained in the Wangenstein jewelry store and Robert Lund's insurance office in west part of the building. In these two, the fire broke thru the basement ceiling. Al's Eat Shop and a barbershop in east part of the building, as well as office rooms on second floor suffered some smoke damage.

Financial Statement

The annual financial statement of Pennington county, prepared by County Auditor H. L. Fowler, is published in this issue of the Spectator. Comparison of different items listed in the 1935 statement with those of 1934, shows the county is in much better condition now than a year ago. Poor fund warrants issued during the past year show a substantial decrease over the amount paid out of the same fund in 1933 which is an indication conditions are improving.

Melvin Sherva, former resident here, who has been employed for several years in a job printing plant at Wahpeton, has bought the Journal at Fertile. SKELETONS REVEAL EARLY INDIAN RACE

Four skeletons, remnants of a race believed to have inhabited Minnesota before the Indians, were unearthed in a general pit five miles southeast of Albert Lea, reports the St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Discovery of the grave, which may prove a great value to anthropologists, was made by a paving crew.

University of Minnesota scientists, notified of the find, hurried to the place to take charge of the skeletons.

That the bones were not those of Indians or white men was indicated by the fact, the university men said, that the skulls had scarcely any forehead. The heads slanted straight back from the eye sockets and were decidedly oblong in shape.

The skeletons were buried about three feet under the gravel and rock formation and were fairly well preserved. The bones were of people of large stature.

One of the skeletons had a large brass ring lying near the nasal opening of the skull, indicating it had been worn as a nose ornament. The ring is larger than a dollar and crudely carved.

The scientists expressed the opinion that the discovery woud be of extreme importance and pronounced the find rare.

Statue of Bible Pharaoh Found

Discovery of a statue of Rameses II, the Pharaoh of Exodus at Tanis, Egypt, is considered by Biblical students to be of great importance. It is of black granite, six feet tall, and was unearthed by the French expedition. The statue, which is in good preservation, is described as an anngram of the king, for the hieroglyphics which form his name are represented in the sculpture. He is wearing the sun disk (hieroglyphic RA), he is a child (hieroglyphic MES), and in his hand he holds the reed-sign (hieroglyphic SU). He is shown as being protected by the little-known falcon-headed god Hurun. The statue was found in the third court of the great temple of Rameses II. Numerous other buildings erected during the reign of the Pharaoh of the Bible were discovered, but these had been rebuilt at a later date.

Selling Short

To sell short is to sell securities with the expectation that one will be able to purchase again at a lower price; in other words, says a writer in the Detroit News, it amounts to speculating for a decline in prices. The word "short" in this sense means "lacking" or "not being in possession of the securities that are being sold." The stocks are borrowed for the transaction; if in the interval between selling and buying the stocks have declined the trade is profitable and if there has been an advance it is unprofitable. If the seller actually owns the stock he is not selling short.

Honest Man Finds Purse With $400, Returns It

Waseca—Gangsters and rackateers may rule some cities, but down in the town of Waseca the good old-fashioned type of honesty still prevails, and a purse which contains $400 in currency doesn't belong to the one who finds it until it is impossible to learn the loser's indentity. Sam Lambert, St. Mary, stopped his car on the streets of Waseca to pick up a ladies purse containing almost that amount of money, together with valuable papers. He immediately took it to the newspaper office to advertise for the owner. A few minutes after he had left, the owner came in to report her loss, almost fainting when she found the purse and its contents safe. Lambert neither asked nor received any reward.

13-Year-Old Girl Robs Mail Boxes

Rochester—Theft of mail from boxes in two apartment buildings and on at least 15 occasions by a 13-year-old Rochester girl was revealed recently. Three checks, one of them for $70, were taken from the mail boxes, but only one draft for $2 was cashed. A check payable to Miss Isabel Jones for this amount was forged with her endorsement by the girl and cashed in a down town store, while another for $22.65 was found on her possession when taken into custody. A third check for $70 was returned to the owner with the explanation that it had been "found in the bushes", and a small reward collected. The girl confessed to 15 thefts of letters, but it was suspected that possibly 25 additional pieces of mail had been taken from boxes, most of them being returned when found to contain no money.

Kill Seven Wolf Cubs, Collect $42

Fergus Falls — Some people, they say, are born lucky, and Alfred Tordsen, of Amor township, must be among the number. Young Tordsen and his brother happened to run across two wolf cubs frolicking in the sun recently and trailed them to their den, where another five of the young wolves were found. One of them stood guard while the other went after a spade and a rifle, and it was not long before the cubs had been prepared for bounty, which amounted to $6 per young wolf, or $42 in all for a few minutes time. Wolves have been scarce in Otter Tail county during the past few years, and bounties have been few and far apart.

Smooth Gents Get First Dollar Of Old Age Pension

Janesville—A new racket for "one-day residents" has appeared in Janesville, with a couple of smooth gents in a 1934 Pontiac sedan with a North Dakota license so covered with mud that the number was obscured, taking membership in an Old Age Pension club. The two drove back and forth on the streets, watching out for folk around 60 years of age. Spotting a victim, they drove up, stopped, and started their line of chatter. Neither got out of the car, and the motor was kept running. There approach was made through the offer of a cigar, and for a dollar membership, cash on the line, they assured their new "members" that their names would be in the front line when the shakels were handed out under the proposed old age pension act.

Ships' Shrouds

Shrouds are the ropes fitted in pairs, constituting a part of the standing rigging of a ship. Shrouds are often made of wire and are stretched from the masthead of a vessel to the sides or to the runs of a top, serving as a means of ascent and as lateral strengthening stays to the masts. The guys for bracing a steamer's smokestacks are sometimes called shrouds.

The Way of Providence

From an ancient book of sermons we glean that among the many proofs of the wisdom and benevolence of Providence is the fact that the world was not created in the midst of winter, when Adam and Eve could have found nothing to eat, but in harvest time, when there was fruit on every tree.

Has Largest Army

The distinction of having the largest army, in proportion to its population, belongs to Switzerland, whose citizens strangely enjoy the reputation of being the most peace-loving of the civilized peoples of the world, thereby seemingly refuting the theory that large armaments are the breeders of wars, observes G. R. Turner in the Kansas City Times. In this tiny Alpine republic almost every able-bodied male inhabitant is a trained and efficient soldier. With a total population approximately equivalent to that of the single American city of Chicago, Switzerland supports an army (inclusive of regular and reserve troops) more than one and one-half times greater than the combined active and reserve military forces of the United States.

CONVALESCENT DOG NEEDS EXTRA CARE

"Yes, the operation was successful, but unfortunately the patient died."

Too often a person on the very threshold of recovery from a dangerous illness will suffer a "relapse" which proves fatal. This is not confined to human beings. It is one of the most frequent—and unnecessary—causes of death among dogs.

The reason is that a dog's inherent grit and fighting spirit may be mistaken for strength, explains the Chappel Kennel Foundation. He is permitted to get out and "tear around," wasting what little energy he has, when he should be still confined to rest and quiet, sunshine and simple feeding.

Much chronic stomach trouble in canines, especially that which follows distemper, is caused by a too hasty return to heavy diet, in the mistaken belief that it will enable the patient to recover his strength quickly.

The old idea of taking away meat in fever cases, because it was "heating the blood," has been discredited. Meat is a natural part of the dog's diet at all times, and contains nitrogen, without which waste tissues cannot be repaired. Horsemeat, because of its soft, easily digested tissue and high nitrogen content, is generally recommended for convalescent dogs and dogs with skin trouble.

Tests in the Foundation laboratories at Rockford, Illinois, indicate that the same balanced ration of meat, cereals and minerals should be given to the dog in convalescence as in health, but in smaller quantities.

Ohio's Vice Presidents

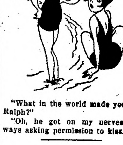
Three vice presidents were native Ohioans. They were Thomas A. Hendricks, born at East Fultonham, Muskingum county, in 1819, who served with President Cleveland for the term beginning in 1885; Charles W. Fairbanks, born in Union county in 1852, Theodore Roosevelt's vice president during his second administration; and Charles G. Dawes, born in Marietta in 1865, vice president in Coolidge's second administration. The youngest vice president was John C. Breckenridge of Kentucky, who was thirty-six years old when he was inaugurated.

BROWS AND BROWS

"Do you think there is any chance of our breaking into the smart-set here?"

"By smart-set do you mean high-brow or low-neck?"

OLD FOGY



"What in the world made you jilt Ralph?"

"Oh, he got on my nerves, always asking permission to kiss me."

Potato Not Irish

Ireland is not the home of the Irish potato. Its original home was western South America where it was found and taken to Europe by explorers who were in search of gold. The potato did not win immediate favor in Europe. War, famine and kingly decrees first were necessary before it gained popularity. In Scotland, it was considered for many years the forbidden fruit that got Adam and Eve into everlasting disgrace.

Kuvasz Shepherd Dog Is From White Dog of Tibet

Powerful both in physical makeup and in its appeal to lovers of the working group of pure-bred dogs is the Shepherd dog. It has been since the early days of the American Kennel club when the old American Shepherd dog was "all the go." It is quite interesting to note that another breed of Shepherd dogs is also in popular favor.

These are Kuvasz or the Hungarian Shepherd dog, brought to the fore by some of its ardent fanciers. Really, the Shepherd dogs are the oldest dog race. Scientists declare that they are the descendants of the ancient Tibet dogs and of the "bronze" dog. The Kuvasz history is quite interesting, for this group is descended from the white dogs famed in Tibet as being more or less regarded as "sacred dogs," having a lineage and history which can clearly be traced back 1,000 years.

Quite intensive research has been conducted into the past of these dogs and it has been found that they were first brought into the spotlight by King Mathias I (1458-1490). On his manors in Transylvania King Mathias used this breed for hunting in the high mountains, and they were only owned by princes and magnates. Hence the name "Kuvasz" was given these pure white dogs because they were the guardians of the lords, for the word kuvasz in Turkish means "armed guards of the European ambassadors and consuls."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Roman Pottery Kiln Site of First Century Origin

A remarkable Roman-Saxon pottery site dating from the First century, discovered near Wimborne, Dorsetshire, England, was on the ancient Roman road, running between Hamworthy and Badbury Rings.

The kiln itself was destroyed before it could be properly examined. Subsequent excavation laid bare a long narrow stoke-hole about 16 feet long and 5 feet wide. This contained a vast quantity of kiln debris, including the remains of nearly 200 vessels of various kinds, mostly underfired, as well as piles of sand and lumps of clay prepared for potting.

The pottery represented was mostly of five different types, and these form an important group, three types being forms in use in South Britain in the early Iron age, while the two other are varieties introduced by the Romans. The transitional character of the pottery is confirmed by the discovery on the floor of the stoke-hole of a coin of the Emperor Caligula, A. D. 40.

One of the early Iron age types represented is the well known "bead-rim" pot. The early Roman forms are basins or mortars provided with a spout, and wide-bellied jugs of buff or pinkish clay fitted with a handle.

Find Ancient Cats

Skeletons of two ancient cats were discovered by Smithsonian museum paleontologists in southern Idaho that were believed to have lived in that section just before the coming of the great ice sheet. This skeletal material represents two distinct lines of the cat family. One line, represented by the great saber-toothed cats and near relatives, were probably the most efficient killers the world has ever known. It is believed by some that this efficiency hastened their extinction by killing off their own meat supply. The other find resembles the true cat family of the present day, including everything from the puma down to the house cat. It may not have been the direct ancestor of the present family, the scientists say, but it certainly was a close relative. It was one of the most widely distributed of the New world mammals, ranging over both North and South America.—Pathfinder Magazine.

The Damascus Sword Blade

The Crusaders first drew attention to Damascus blades. They were found to possess not only great elasticity, united with considerable hardness, but their surfaces were covered with beautiful designs formed by a tissue of dark lines on a light ground, or light lines upon a dark ground and occasionally by the inlaying of gold on the steel blue ground. Gold and silver are inlaid in the higher class of sword blade. In genuine Damascus blades the designs run through the substance of the blade and the watering on regular, almost symmetrical figuring is not worn off by friction or even grinding.

Banjo Clocks

The first banjo clocks were made by one of the families of Connecticut clockmakers, the Willards, in a dozen clockmaking enterprises, as individuals or in partnerships. The earliest form of the banjo clock was patented by Simon Willard of Boston, in 1802, as an "improved timepiece." The banjo clocks were a comparatively small part of his product but there were nevertheless a great number of them, for he was in the business many years, dying in 1848 at the age of ninety-five.

"The Forty Immortals" Founded by Richelieu

The French academy is the most important and best known of the five academies composing the French institute, the other four being the Academies des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, the Academie des Sciences, the Academie des Beaux-Arts, and the Academie des Sciences Morales et Politiques.

The French academy was founded in 1625 by Cardinal Richelieu and consists of 40 members—popularly known as "The Forty Immortals." Its objects are to prepare a dictionary of the French language and to render the Gallic tongue pure and exact, and capable of treating of the arts and sciences.

The dictionary appeared in its first edition in 1694, and has undergone almost constant revision since. It has been severely criticized and is by many considered inferior to certain dictionaries emanating from less celebrated sources.

The academy is a self-perpetuating body, filling its own vacancies. Owing to its extremely conservative tendencies it has frequently chosen its members from among men whose careers were practically ended. Hence the humorous designation "The Hotel des Invalides of Literature."

Many well-known men of letters have failed of election to the French academy, and the term "41st chair" has come to designate a man of note whose scholarship entitled him to membership in that body.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Origin of the "A," First Letter of the Alphabet

Some wise man once wrote, "what is ever seen is never seen." The saying is particularly true of the alphabet. "In the words of Prof. Isaac Taylor," says the Chicago Tribune, "the alphabet may be fairly accounted the most difficult as well as the most fruitful of all the past achievements of human intellect. It has been at once the triumph, the instrument, and the register of the progress of our race." Yet the alphabet is so commonplace a fundamental of human intercourse that its history is little appreciated or known.

The Phoenician A, considered as one of the very earliest of alphabetical forms, stood for a breathing sound. Vowels were not represented in the Semitic alphabets. The Greek alphabet was a development of the Phoenician. The early Greek alphabet is dated at approximately the Ninth century B. C. In the early centuries of the Christian calendar the Romans further changed and developed the alphabet. Roman writings in stone in early times were inscribed with large capital letters, such as the Roman A. This form has come down to us unchanged in many respects. It is strongly contrasted with the Hebrew form of A.

Stalin's Biography in 17 Words

In the Biographical Annual, published by the Izvestia, the organ of the Soviet government, the shortest note reads as follows: "Stalin, Joseph Vissarionovich Djugashirli; b. Gori, Tiflis province, 1879; m. Nadejda Sergeyevna Alleluya (d. 1932); two S." There is nothing about his being de jure secretary general of the Russian Communist party, or de facto dictator of the U. S. S. R. The "Small Soviet Encyclopedia," also published at Moscow, remedies the first omission, but not the second, and adds the information that "he became the successor of Lenin through the testament" of the latter, followed by 3,000 words covering his school days and early life in Tiflis, Transcaucasia, his scholarship and his "superhuman" industry.

People of Ireland

In the population of Ireland, three major types are usually recognized. The most primitive is the short, black-haired type, sometimes called Firbolg, variously defined by anthropologists as non-Aryan or as Iberian or a branch of the Mediterranean race. The conquerors of these peoples were a tall and blond race known as Tuatha De Danann, who were either Scandinavian or Celtic-speaking peoples. They were followed by the Gaelic invasion, probably within historic times. This Celtic-speaking race is identified with the predominant type of Irish of the present day.

Calends, Nones and Ides

In the Roman calendar the month was divided into unequal parts by the days which were known as the Calends, Nones and Ides. The Calends were always the first day of the month, the Nones came on the fifth or seventh, and the Ides on the thirteenth or fifteenth. Although the term, strictly speaking, refers to only one day, it is sometimes loosely used of the seven days preceding.

Salaam Racing

This form of skiing competition originated in Norway. It was first called slalaam, in the Telemark dialect. Laam means a track. In Telemarken there are two laams connected with skiing. A hoplaam is a track having a jump on it somewhere, and a slalaam is a track without a jump, comparatively smooth but with troublesome curves

New Orleans is not at the mouth of the Mississippi river, but nearly 100 miles upstream.

$2,500,000 D. C. Building Without Official Name

The word "District" or "District Building" is only a courtesy title. When it is written it must carry quotation marks to be legitimate, says the Washington Post.

Except by the incidental mention of the name "District building" in the appropriation "for care of the District building," in the District of Columbia appropriation law of May 26, 1908, and subsequent laws, that building, located at Square 255, between Thirteenth-and-a-half, Fourteenth and D streets and Pennsylvania avenue northwest, has never been formally named.

The statuary around the upper cornices of the building was designed by Adolph De Nesti.

The two figures on either side of the cartouche over the main entrance represent Justice and Law, from east to west.

There are 28 statues around the top cornices, carved in the same white marble from which the entire building is constructed. The eight figures above the main cornice typify, beginning at the east end: Sculpture (male); Painting (female), Architecture (male), Music (female), Commerce (female), Engineering (male), Agriculture (female), and Statesmanship (male). These are reproduced in number and order in the rear. On the north end of the west side they run as follows: Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Music, Engineering and Commerce; on the south end of the east side, Music, Architecture, Commerce, Engineering, Agriculture and Statesmanship.

Sugar Cane From India; "Sweet Stick of the East"

Sugar cane, "the sweet stick of the East," is supposed to have been indigenous to India. It did not become an article of household consumption until the middle of the Sixteenth century. Almost immediately Cuba became an important sugar producer; that country is aptly called the world's sugar bowl. Her soil, temperature and rainfall combine to make it possible to produce sugar with less human effort than in any other place in the world.

The reproduction of sugar cane occurs in two ways: either the roots are left in the ground after the year's crop and make a new crop, or else short stalks of cut cane are planted horizontally in furrows. From the "eye" of the joints of these stalks a new crop rises. The latter method is, of course, more expensive. In most countries it is not profitable to ratoon for more than a year on account of a diminishing yield, and new planting is then resorted to. In the fecund soil of Cuba ratooning is commonly practiced from four to eight years, and in some isolated cases for more than 20 successive years the cane has yielded its sweet gift without more encouragement than a mere cutting of the crop and a little cultivation of the ground each year.—New York Herald Tribune.

The Lowly Pretzel

In shape, the pretzel once had a special religious significance to good folk in the forest regions of southern Germany. They were called "bretzeln" then, and were made to be eaten only during holy week. They were given their peculiar shape in order to suggest the knots of rope tied about Christ's wrists at the time of his crucifixion. Eating them was a part of the religious observance of those times, but their fame as a tasty morsel carried beyond the forest regions and beyond the holy days. Finally, their place of origin and significance were forgotten and they became just pretzels.—Washington Post.

Nearest to Diamonds

The gem stone nearest in appearance to the diamond is the colorless zircon. The index of refraction of this mineral aproaches that of the diamond, but it lacks the dispersive properties of the diamond and does not show the bright red and blue flashes of the latter stone. The zircon has a hardness less than that of the diamond. These stones are found in Ceylon, but are usually obtained by decolorizing colored stones by careful heating. They are sometimes called Madura diamonds. They are classed as semi-precious stones.

The Badger

When put to it to defend himself, the badger has fierce courage, and will usually satisfy attackers they had better retreat. Squatting low to the ground, and provided with powerful muscles and sharp teeth, he can inflict serious wounds. When attacked the badger gives off a powerful and nauseous scent from a pair of glands near the base of the tail. (He belongs to the "stink-cat" family; a relative of the weasel, mink and skunk.)

Reciprocity

A remarkable example of the vital interdependence which sometimes occurs between a plant and an animal is that of the yucca shrub and the yucca moth. The plant is fertilized by pollen that is brought to it only by this moth, and the moth's larvae are fed by food that is produced only by this plant.—Collier's Weekly.

Smallest Province in Canada

Prince Edward Island is the smallest province in Canada.

Shallow Water Fish Know Colors That Assure Food

The retina of the eye of all our mammals contains minute rods and cones. The rods help us to perceive the difference between light, shade and form, while the cones assist us to tell the difference between colors. In all nocturnal animals, observes a writer in the Detroit News, the rods predominate to such an extent that they have little color sense. In some birds, and especially in the reptiles, the cones contain tiny drops of red or yellow oil which has the effect of making it impossible for them to select blue as a color.

Animals able to change their appearance to agree with the surroundings are able to distinguish colors, and many painters might envy the quick-changing artist, the chameleon.

It has been stated that all backboneless animals are color-blind, but experiments have shown that some prawns are able to distinguish colors. Fish which live in shallow water learn that certain colors denote food, but the elusive trout seems to be constantly changing his favorite hues, as fly-fishermen know.

I have sometimes whipped the water for hours without obtaining a rise, but on changing the artificial fly, and offering them one of more attractive colors, several fish have been landed. But the deep-sea fish have little opportunity of using colors since the depths are so black.

The common frog is sensitive to color, as a simple experiment will prove. Shine different colored lights upon its body, and we find that it alters the rate of its breathing with each hue.

Phrase "Go to Jericho" Dates to Henry Eighth

Do you know a Jericho lying beyond Jordan and yet within 25 miles of London? It was there that Henry the Eighth often spent his week-ends with the latest lady of his heart. This Old-world spot, redolent with history and romance, and practically untouched by the passing of Time, is near Ongar, amid the Essex woodland. Here runs Jordan; and close by lies Jericho in all the glory of its Tudor red brick, with cedars of Lebanon, arbors festooned with roses, laurel hedges, the most resilient of green lawns and towering hollyhocks. It was one of Henry's whimsicalities that induced him to bestow these Biblical names on a little Essex rivulet and the adjacent mansion. Little did he realize, however, that at the same time he was providing the English-speaking races with that expressive phrase, "Go to Jericho!" For so boring was the work for his courtiers in this lonely retreat—Henry demanding their presence but rarely giving them anything to do—that when one member of the court wanted to be rude to another he would exclaim, "Oh, go to Jericho!"

Olfactory Sense

Unlike the other four sense organs, the nose is always the butt for ridicule, but what a sin it is that malodorous civilization is allowed to blunt or blot out the nasal memory, is the complaint of a writer in Hygeia, the Health Magazine. Primitive races of men retain a keen olfactory sense and make use of it in protecting themselves from danger or in locating a possible supply of food, but the more advanced civilizations have little need for these uses and therefore have failed to utilize the sense properly.

The loss of the sense of smell may be due to abuse, as the result of using strong perfumes persistently or such practices as the Victorian custom of using snuff; it may be due to nasal infection resulting from influenza or some such cause; or it may come from an occupational cause, as in the case of electrotypers who must constantly inhale fumes of acids.

Holland Under Water

Ages ago nearly the entire area of present-day Holland was under water, with here and there a small island rearing its crown above the waves. The early "Batavians," as they were called, realizing the fertility of the soil which was being inundated at stated periods, devised means of reclaiming small areas of land by imitating the beaver. They constructed primitive dams and dikes to hold back the water, which they pumped by equally primitive methods from their small "polders," gradually enlarging these areas, until about 8,000 square miles, of a total land area of 12,000 square miles, has been conquered from the sea.

The Santiago Naval Battle

Five hundred Spaniards were killed or wounded in the Santiago naval engagement. But only one American lost his life. Four armoured cruisers, including the 7,000-ton Vizcaya and two destroyers, were sunk or driven ashore by deadly Yankee gunfire. Cervera's defeat was complete. The fight was marked by gallant deeds on both sides, and by the immortal exclamation of the American captain who shouted above the din: "Don't cheer, boys; the poor devils are dying."

Jackdaws Rout Cat

A variation of the nursery ditty about "the king in his counting room," "the queen in her garden," while the "maid hanging out clothes" had her nose snipped off by a jackdaw is suggested by a recent episode in a Torquay garden, in Devonshire, England. A cat which attempted to catch a young jackdaw was attacked and badly pecked by 5 jackdaws which flew down from trees.

Mosque of St. Sophia

The Mosque of St. Sophia was built at Constantinople as a Christian cathedral by the Roman Emperor Justinian, 531-538 A. D., in the form of a Greek cross, 269 by 143 feet with a flattened dome 180 feet high, set in a cluster of cupolas and minarets. The brick walls are lined on the inside with marble plundered from Greek temples. The Sultan of Turkey, Mohammed II, turned the cathedral into a mosque in 1453 A. D.

Huckleberries Corrode Iron

Huckleberry patches will indirectly cause a strong corrosive action on iron. This discovery comes as a warning against laying pipe lines through beds in which these succulent berries grow, report Science Service. A case where the iron supports of an electrical power line were badly corroded as a result of the acid soil and the presence of carbon dioxide gas in places where huckleberry bushes thrive is reported in the technical publication Metals and Alloys, says the writer. Nearly everything in nature seems to conspire to rust iron, but the quality of soil necesssary to the growth of huckleberry bushes apparently is more apt to do damage to iron than many other natural conditions, it is pointed out.

It was at Ceylon that Adam and Eve spent their legendary exile after their banishment from Eden, notes a writer in the Washington Post. This island that rests in the sea at the southern tip of India is peopled largely by the Singhalese. Colombo is its capital, itself a pleasant city with wide spaces and a sheltered harbor for its great sea traffic. The famous buried cities of Ceylon were Buddhist cities, and many of the inhabitants are Buddhists. The best known of these buried cities is Anuradhapura and the two largest inland towns of Ceylon are Kandy and Newara Eliya.

Detective's Wife

By MARIE WEST

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

UNDER the glare of the street light Sara saw the man's face as he passed her. The sight of it sent a paralyzing chill down her spine. For the last six months that face had been staring at her from the front pages of the Chicago newspapers. Foxy Fenton! Wanted for a string of bank robberies. Wanted for murder.

And for the last six months she'd been hearing that name over and over. Tim couldn't stop talking about him. That's what it meant being married to a detective.

Foxy Fenton! If only a polceman would appear! But that was hoping too much on a quiet street like this. And Tim wouldn't be coming home this way for another half-hour.

Instinctively she lengthened her stride. Perhaps it was being Tim's wife that made this feeling sweep through her, this urgent necessity to do something about it. She couldn't just let a criminal walk past her and disappear.

But, being a scant five feet of slim, inadequate strength, she shuddered. What she had suddenly decided to do would take all the courage she could summon.

She had nearly caught up with the man.

Stumbling off the curb she fell against him. It could easily have been accidental; the man steadied her an instant, a speculative gleam in his eyes.

"Thanks!" She withdrew her arm slowly, managed an arch smile.

"We seem to be goin' the same way," the man said finally, his voice casual.

"Yeah. . . . I live a block down the street. . . ."

A classy dame, he noted. Didn't look the type—yet you never could tell.

Hs grinned down at her. "And you're lonesome," he said. "Sure, so'm I, sister."

They climbed the two flights of stairs.

"Well, here we are." She made her voice gay. "How about a highball?"

"Now you're talking, baby. Make mine strong. Need any help?"

"No, thanks. I'll be right back."

It was relief to escape from him for a few minutes; a chance to get a firmer grip on herself. It wouldn't be for long. Just until Tim came. Tim would take care of him then. She squared her shoulders.

The man was sitting on the davenport when she returned. He took the glass she offered and patted the seat beside him. "Here's to you." He took a long gulp.

She sipped the plain ginger ale she had poured for herself. If she could just make him talk so he wouldn't touch her. She was afraid she might scream if he did that.

"How about some music," she suggested brightly going over to the radio.

"Get something peppy," he put in.

She took as long as she could. "How's this?" Rhythmic emerged from the loud speaker.

"Okay."

She saw that his glass was empty. "I'll get you another drink," she said. Tim was late tonight. Tonight when she needed him so desperately!

She brought the drink into the living room. With one hand the man took it and with the other he drew her down beside him. She held her trembling lips together. Soon he would be trying to kiss her. Soon—

The key in the lock. At last! And big Tim standing there, his mouth agape.

"Oh Tim!" she cried.

The man jumped to his feet, his eyes narrow slits.

Tim stared at him. "As I breathe to live," he marveled, "I'd say you were Foxy Fenton, himself, if he hadn't been caught tonight."

"Caught?" Sara's voice was barely a whisper.

"Picked up in Nebraska. Late papers are full of it."

"Oh, I thought—" she began weakly.

"You thought I was Fenton?" the man roared. "And you were setting a trap. Ain't that a laugh?" He turned to Tim. "If you're the lady's husband, I'm sorry, pal. I didn't know she was married."

As the door closed upon him, Sara burst into hysterical tears.

"Tim," she gulped, "I saw him on the street. I wanted—"

"Sure, I know, Honey," he said gently. "You're a brave little thing." A glint of humor came into his blue eyes. "But you leave the detecting to me, Honey. It's too dangerous for a pint-sized infant like you."

Next morning as Sara lit the flame under the coffee pot, she heard the familiar thud as the morning paper hit the back door. She ran out to get it. Spreading it open, she gasped at the headlines:

FOXY FENTON SUSPECT FREED

Her eyes scanned the column. The man in Nebraska wasn't Fenton after all. Just a suspicious character who looked like him. The police were working on the latest tip-off that Fenton was hiding in Chicago.

"Tim," she called.

"What is it, Honey?"

"Look!"

Over the page their eyes met with the same question.

The pups were probably mongrels, but look like shepherds or collies.

Cases of Sextuplet Birth
Recorded in 6 Countries

Delving among Chinese annals, Dr. Berthold Laufer, curator of anthropology at Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago, has found no record of a quintuplet birth in that country, but has discovered records of two sextuplet births. In 1574, according to the Chinese historians, a woman in Kwang-p'ing fu, Chi-li province, is said to have given birth to six children at once. In 1805 a woman in a village of Kwei-chou province was reported as bearing six sons, and mother and children all lived.

Records of Chi-li province state also that in 1527 a woman of Ho-kien gave birth to seven girls at the same time, but none of them survived.

A few instances of quintuplet births in ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome, mentioned by various ancient writers, seem to be well authenticated, says Doctor Laufer.

Other cases of sextuplet births are on record from Italy, Africa, Japan, Boston, Mass., and London, England. In 1600 in the town of Hameln, in Germany, two boys and five girls were reported as being born simultaneously, but this record is of very doubtful authenticity. Likewise open to great doubt is the report of eight children being born at once, and living, to a negro woman of the Levant, as stated by a Sixteenth century French writer.

Crutches for Eyelids

"Eyelid crutches" are now being used by persons suffering from ptosis, the permanent drooping or falling of the upper eyelid, due to paralysis of the lifting muscle, writes W. A. Summers, Lansdale, Pa., in Collier's Weekly. These crutches, which are made of platinum and attached to the ordinary spectacle frames, fit invisibly in the exterior fold of the lid and comfortably support it in a natural open position.

Kept Constantly Diffused

The Brownian Movement—which results from the bombardment of minute particles by the molecules of a liquid and which keeps those particles in constant motion and suspension—is well illustrated by a sealed jar of water in a London laboratory, writes Leonard Eckmann, Yonkers, New York, in Collier's Weekly. More than 90 years ago very fine particles of gold were dropped into it. Today they are still diffused throughout the water.

Homesickness

Homesickness sometimes becomes so intense that the sufferer not only loses all desire to eat and sleep but develops a melancholia which leads to insanity and death. In fact, army medical officers recognize it, in extreme cases, as a disability which warrants a furlough, or even a discharge, in order to save a soldier's life.—Collier's Weekly.

Tax Adjustment Offers Saving Here

Plan Would Cut Levies 35 to 40 Per Cent and Benefit to Rural Counties Especially

Plans for a readjustment of the tax burden that will bring substantial reductions to owners of homes, farms, and other general property here rapidly are taking shape in the Minnesota legislature, officials of the Minnesota Federation of Associations for Tax Reform reported in a communication received here today and urged taxpayers to give the program their active support.

The main features of the readjustment program as they now are taking form are:

A bill proposing a constitutional amendment limiting the tax on general property to 1 per cent of the full and true value in the country and 1.5 per cent in the cities and villages, exclusive of money needed for debt charges.

A statutory tax limitation bill to give relief to property owners pending adoption of the constitutional amendment.

A gross income tax law designed to raise $40,000,000 to replace such funds as may be necessary of those taken away from governmental units by the tax limitation measures.

The tax limitation amendment would mean a reduction of 35 to 40 per cent in the taxes on homes, farms and other general property in the average community, Constant Larson of Alexandria, president of the Minnesota Federation of Associations for Tax Reform, said in his statement today, and the local taxing units in this county and in others throughout Minnesota would get money from the state to replace that cut off the local tax rolls.

"The rural counties of the state have suffered especially from the present inequitable tax system which requires general property to carry about 80 per cent of the tax load," Mr. Larson said. Farmers have virtually all their belongings in land or personal property, and the same is true of many residents of the villages and small cities.

"Two-thirds of the assessed valuation of the state lies in the country and smaller cities and villages of the state. Two-thirds of the $40,000,000 which we expect to cut off the general property taxes by this program will go to the rural counties of the state. That shows why the people who live in these counties should be vitally interested in this program. We have a chance through it to bring about an equalization of the tax burden and escape the penalty that has rested so long on communities where the wealth is concentrated largely in land."

Mr. Larson said that the only serious opposition to the program so far has come from the large cities, but that the federation hopes to overcome this if residents of the rural counties will rally to the support of the program in sufficient numbers and write to their legislators asking for its passage.

Deliver Quality Cream

Delivery of a high quality of cream by patrons enables this creamery to make better butter which commands a higher price. This, in turn, permits the creamery to pay more to patrons. Do not let your cream freeze when bringing it in. Wrap the cans with blankets or other suitable covering. Careful attention to all small details in handling cream means more money for the producer.

Importance of Sunspots Is Not Highly Esteemed

Thermocouples show that the surface heat of the sun varies slightly, being hotter when the spots are numerous. Moreover, the earth's magnetic field usually (but not always) fluctuates in step with the spots. In the opinion of Dr. Seth B. Nicholson, who has studied sunspots intensely with the most precise instruments on Mount Wilson, weather may appear to vary with sunspots, but a scientific study of the facts usually shows that the relationship was accidental and does not hold for any considerable length of time.

We are apt to magnify the importance of sunspots. In the first place, they are 93,000,000 miles away. In the next place, even when most numerous, they cover less than one-half of 1 per cent of the sun's surface. So it all comes down to this: no very reliable knowledge exists regarding the influence of sunspots on weather, business conditions or human behavior.

Great Wild Life Sanctuary

The world's most wonderful sanctuary for wild life lies in the northeastern portion of the Transvaal bordering on Portuguese East Africa, between the Crocodile river and the Pretoria. It presents a vast variety of scenery, from the wild gorges where the great rivers thread their way through the Limpopo hills, to the open, palm-dotted flats of the Singwedsi, and the dense thorn bush country of the Sabi river. Away to the west tower the giant Drakensberg peaks, from whose summits the low veldt appears like a huge billiard table.

The Word "Woman"

Etymologists are in full agreement that the word "woman" has a straight line of descent from the Anglo-Saxon "wifman," literally "wife man." The gradual change from wifman to wymman, wumman, womman, woman, is clearly traceable in the literary records and does not encourage the idea that the word has any but an accidental resemblance to "womb."—Literary Digest.

Lamps Used Before Candles

The use of lamp light appeared in this country before the candlestick. Until the year 1630 there was no tallow from which to mold candles.

Aunt Emma

By CHET GRANT

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

"LISTEN, ma, when is she goin' home, huh, ma?"

Georgie Blake turned his attention from driving the Iron Horse to catch his mother's eye, but Mrs. Blake was examining the contents of her shopping bag.

"When is who going home, Georgie?"

"'When is who going home!'" Georgie repeated with disgust. "You know who I mean, all right. Aunt Emma: the pest!"

"Now, Georgie, remember, she is your father's sister," Mrs. Blake remarked automatically; she had been saying it for weeks. Then she gave a relieved sigh, "Ah, here it is. I was afraid I'd forgotten Aunt Emma's reducing salts."

"I wish she'd take an overdose of those things and reduce herself back to California," Georgie snapped savagely.

"Don't be silly," his mother advised. "She means all right. It's just that she loves you so much she . . ."

"Listen," Georgie hissed. "Listen, ma, how would you like it if your private life was spread out for public gaze the way mine is every day? How would you like it if somebody went around tellin' how cute you looked in a—a bellyband and showin' a picture of you stark naked on a bearskin rug? Good-night, ma! What made you have that picture taken for, anyway? Like I was a freak or somepin!"

"You must remember . . ."

"That she's my father's sister!" Georgie groaned, reaching for the shopping bag. "I guess you're kind of fed-up, aren't you, ma? You looked kind of mad last night when Aunt Emma was tellin' the minister's wife how hard you set your cap to catch pop."

"We'll say no more about it," his mother remarked severely.

A little more than a month ago Aunt Emma had came from California for a short surprise visit with her brother. She had just turned forty and was working might and main to reverse the process and trip up the march of time. No diet or exercise was too rigorous for her Spartan spirit.

"Yoo-hoo, I'm upstairs." Aunt Emma's soprano heaved against the walls. "Georgie, deah! Guess who's coming up tonight."

"Eddie Cantor," Georgie growled.

"You funny boy!" Aunt Emma twittered. "Of course not. It's the Elston's Young People's society."

"What!" Georgie was in the hall with one wild leap. "What are they comin' up here for?" Alas for all his careful plans to keep plenty of distance between Aunt Emma and the gang's eager ears!

"I knew you'd be delighted, Georgie. You're friend, Mabel Porter, phoned while you were out, so I invited them all to come up to a party."

"Aw, Aunt Emma, I—"

"We'll have the duckiest time, Georgie. Ice cream, cake . . ."

"Nuts!" Georgie mooched into the living room.

"Yes, and nuts," Aunt Emma cooed after him.

* * *

The society arrived in a body for Aunt Emma's fame had spread. Suddenly a bright light shone through the red indignation that surrounded Georgie. The smile he bore as he entered the living room a few minutes later would have ruined a pound of butter.

"Here's my baby now," Aunt Emma clucked. Georgie caught his father's sympathetic wink as the society snickered. "The meeting," Georgie intoned, "will now come to order."

"Listen to the great, big man," Aunt Emma cooed. "And I knew him when he couldn't say anything but 'Goo-goo and ga-ga!'"

"Haw, haw, haw!" That was Skinny Tate, Georgie made mental note. "Say, I'll bet he was all mouth," somebody remarked. "I'll bet he didn't win any baby shows."

"He did, too!" Aunt Emma defended. "Look at this picture taken the day he won first prize at the County fair baby show." The society went into several huddles. "Look at the curls! Wasn't he the cherub! Why, Georgie, shame on you!"

If his friends expected a wrathy outburst from Georgie or a show of discomfort, they were disappointed. He became preoccupied with a package taken from one of his pockets. "Say," Tootles Walsh demanded suddenly, "what're you carryin' that puncture kit in here for?" Georgie grinned as the others turned their attention to this new interest. "Oh," he remarked with a fine nonchalance, "I carry this on account of Aunt Emma's rubber corset. She might get a blowout."

Mrs. Blake and Aunt Emma gasped. Georgie drew the rubber chin strap out of his pocket. "Aunt Emma—" he began when the room was suddenly plunged into darkness. His father's voice cut through the murk. "You'd better come down cellar and help me fix that fuse, Georgie."

The enormity of his deed settled upon Georgie as he crept down the cellar steps. "I ought to belt you," Mr. Blake growled in the darkness. "I . . . Oh, for Pete's sake, kid, holler for your aunt's appreciation. I . . . I have to sit down."

Georgie heard his father chuckling and with a relieved grin he fumbled for the fuse box. The light flashed on before he reached it and his mother came down the stairs.

"I turned out the lights," she snapped. "Shame, Georgie Blake. . . . I've apologized. I've done everything I can."

"Is she going home?" Georgie and his father asked simultaneously.

"She is not." Mrs. Blake wailed. "She's staying another month just to show us she hasn't any hard feeling."

PRODUCES LESS TIN, U. S. USES THE MOST

The world's annual production of tin has varied in the last ten years from about 143,000 to 180,000 long tons. About one-third of this is produced in the Federated Malay states, a British possession in southern Asia; next in importance are the tin mines of Bolivia and the Dutch East Indies, and less important producers are Nigeria, China, Siam, Belgian Congo, Tasmania and some of the European countries.

The United States is the largest consumer of tin, but our domestic production of this metal is negligible. Owing to the great importance of tin in both war and peace times, congress has recently investigated sources of production and conservation of this metal. Its greatest uses are to be found in the making of such alloys as tinplate, solders, bearing metals, bronzes; in the food canning industry and as tinfoil for wrapping various commodities.

In 1932 the United States imported 89,998 tons of tin, valued at $16,473,998 or about 20 cents a pound; during 1933, however, the price went up rapidly to about 50 cents a pound.

The Hawaiian Race

In the mid-Pacific, in what Mark Twain described as "the loveliest fleet of islands that lie anchored in any ocean," is the most heterogeneous group of Americans ever assembled under the United States flag, writes G. R. Turner in the Kansas City Times. The native Hawaiians, at one time the sovereign race of the islands, now represent less than one-tenth of the total population and are being rapidly absorbed by their neighbors. White Americans represent an even smaller percentage. The Portuguese outnumber either, while orientals (chiefly Japanese) constitute more than one-half the total number of inhabitants. Ethnologists predict that here, because of the loosely drawn social lines, will evolve the first semblance of the homogeneous race destined to inhabit the world of the future.

Calf Swings Fifth Leg From Its Neck

Bell Plaine--A freak calf born on the Chris Weldon farm near Belle Plaine gives every indication of living to be a sturdy animal, in spite of being "handicapped" by a fifth leg. This extra leg is attached to the animal's neck, and is larger than the other four, being tipped with a double hoof, or rather 4 toes. As the calf prances around, this extra leg dangles from its neck, and can be thrown to either side of the head. The extra appendage is apparently of no concern to the calf and the animal is entirely normal in every other respect. To remove the 5th leg might cause the animal's death, as well as destroy its value as a possible commercial freak.

18th Century Staircase Restored in Paris Court

There is something rather romantic about the discovery at the Palais de Justice of an Eighteenth century stone staircase which has been boarded up for over seventy years, writes the Paris correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph. Its very existence had been completely forgotten. The boards have been removed, and this "new" entrance to the law courts has been formally "inaugurated."

After a fire in 1860 a court room was constructed over the staircase, and in time all the people who knew on what foundations the room stood disappeared.

Recently the Louis XVI structure was found marked on an old plan, and puzzled architects began to search for it. When they had satisfied themselves that it still existed. It was decided to restore it to the light of day. It is a very elegant piece of work and adds to the beauty of the Palais.

Two old inscriptions which were found have been faithfully preserved. One, "Bureau d'Ecritures," dates from the days of Corneille, and the other, "Lectures de Journaux," from the Convention.

Professional Mourners

Professional mourners can be hired in Spain, and their blackmailing activities are attracting much attention in the Madrid newspapers, says the Montreal Herald. These people, who hire out their services at funerals, have been a long established institution in Spain. But in these days of progress their trade is rapidly declining, and the professional mourners, becoming desperate, now turn up unasked. Formidable gangs of them attach themselves to funeral processions as they pass through the street, wailing loudly. Sometimes the relatives of the dead person pay them for their services. Sometimes they object. In that case the mourners threaten to wreck the funeral unless money is forthcoming.

Fishing a Science

"Fishing is not entirely devoted to catching fish. It is greater than that," says Courtney Ryley Cooper in Esquire Magazine. It is the ability to paddle a canoe, and grit your teeth and take it when the mosquitoes are heavy, to find a trail through heavy bush, to appreciate the beauties which lie about one, to know distance, tension of line, accuracy—and if you master all those eventualities, it naturally follows that you will catch fish, providing the fish are there. It is an exact science.

Crows Foresee Crash

That crows have a foreboding of disaster was shown recently in Ogmore Vale, Wales. For 90 years crows have built their nests in the branches of a lofty oak 200 years old. Without warning they all moved to another tree. A week later their old home tottered in a breeze and fell. After the crash the crows cawed triumphantly.

HOME PROJECT WORK

Northwest School students are now registering for special home project work to be carried on at home during the summer months.

Boys' projects include dairy herd management, pork production, sheep raising, baby beef production, livestock judging, potato, garden and truck crops, windbreak planting, plant identification, weed eradication, beekeeping, pure seed production, farm accounts, poultry production, building construction, tractor operation and community service. Home projects available for girls include fruit, vegetable and meat canning, preserving, baking meal preparation, room turnishing and dressmaking.

These projects are outlined by heads of the various departments at the school and carried on by the students under the direct supervision of Home Project Leaders E. R. Clark, R. Christgau and Retta Bede. The projects are so organized that the students put into practice the information they have gained during the 6 months school year. This work, therefore, results in the establishment of miniature demonstration and experimental farms throughout this region. At the close of the season, each season, each student is required to make a careful report including production method and financial returns.

Tank Of Gas Washed Down Sewer, Fear Fire

Rochester—There was almost a "hot time" in Rochester recently when 1500 gallons of gasoline flooded a large area and needed only a spark from clanging metal or a lighted match to be touched off. The gasoline had been consigned to a local station but drained from a tank car when pressure on the safety valve in the sediment tank proved too great and the cap underneath was broken. Police and firemen, fearing a bad situation if the gas were ever ignited, kept spectators at a distance while the fire laddies diluted the fluid with water and then flushed it down the sewer. Automobiles were not allowed to pass within a block. The sewer system would have been destroyed by a blazing inferno if the gas became ignited after being washed down the pipes, but it was deemed better to take that chance than to leave the liquid exposed on the surface.

Deserted Children Start Hitch-Hike To Relatives

Fergus Falls-Two forlorn children, deserted by their parents in Duluth and on a long hitch-hike to Moorhead, where they hoped to find their mother or father among relatives, were visitors at Fergus Falls recently. Left in rented rooms in Duluth, the children continued going to school until provisions ran short. After several days they struck out, penniless, for Moorhead. A Good Samaritan picked them up near Brainerd, took them into Fergus Falls where he purchased food for them and bought tickets for the pair on to Moorhead. The girl gave her name as Adeles O' Connor, age 16 years, and said her brother Alvin was 12 years old. The children were fairly well clad and each carried a package of clothing

Hitch-Hiking Bandit Thumps Way To Jail

Montorville--One hitch hiker will receive a longer "ride" than he expected and will probably return from the ride sadder but wiser, as a result of being picked up by the wrong man near here recently. While coming from Kasson to Mantorville, Deputy Sheriff Walter Andrist picked up a hitch hiker along the road, only to find that his fellow passenger was the man who robbed the Andrist store at Berne Feb 10. Latet the hitch-hiker, whose name is Zumbo, admitted his guilt, and stated that he had hid out in the store until after it was closed, to rob the till at his leisure. In addition to the money stolen, some merchandise was also taken.

Birds Need No Winter Feeding Near Waseca

-Waseco--Pheasants do not need special feeding grounds near Waseca, and Walter Scholljegerdes has found that the birds can clean an ear of corn as well as a corn sheller, with a resultant loss of 150 bushels of corn in one field. The big snow storm the first of December prevented him from husking a field of standing corn, and the birds have had a winter picnic there ever since. They spend the nights in the shelter of a nearby slough and visit the corn field daily. The whole field has been wiped out.

Toy Pistols Banned

In 1905 the Indiana legislature thus banned toy pistols: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company or corporation to manufacture, sell or expose for sale, or give away as a prize or reward, any toy pistol or other device for the purpose of exploding caps or wafers containing fulminates or other explosive compounds; any person, firm, company or corporation so manufacturing, selling or offering to sell or give away any such toy pistol or other device, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $50 or be imprisoned in the county jail not less than ten days nor more than twenty days." The statute has been ignored in most communities.

Electricity Locates Ore

One of the achievements of science has been the perfection of an efficacious method of locating ore deposits by electricity, says the Washington Post. It is based on the recording of a difference of potential set up by electric statics or dynamic waves which are either induced or pre-existent in the metallic ores. The mining expert plots an electric field by recording these variations in potential at different points in a certain locality. Usually if ore deposits are present, they are found at the center of this field, being located either by diamond or churn drilling or underground prospecting methods.

In Immigration Service

The various positions in the field service of the Immigration department are those of clerks and stenographers; immigrant inspectors, including examination of arriving aliens at ports of entry, such as New York and Niagara Falls; investigation of cases of aliens after their entry into the United States; deportation of those entering illegally, and border patrol inspectors stationed along the Canadian and Mexican borders to check illegal entry of aliens.

Smoke Writing

The material used by aviators to do smoke writing in the air is stated to be a smoke pot made of tar, a certain amount of rosin and solidified alcohol, and the machines used are equipped with smoke generator and ejector in the fuselage. The smoke is produced at the rate of about 250,000 cubic feet a second, and according to one estimate, it takes about 8,000,000 cubic feet of smoke for each letter, about a mile long.

Penguins Most Comical; Stand Erect Like a Man

There is a bird so helpless and defenseless against human attack that it has stirred the pity of civilized nations and become the subject of an international protective treaty, says a writer in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Penguins were in danger of being wholly exterminated by man before the treaty was made. Many years ago the birds were very common, but they were slaughtered by the hundreds of thousands because men coveted the valuable oil in their bodies.

The birds collect in droves on Antarctic islands during the mating season. They stand straight up and waddle awkwardly on their two short legs, like old frock-coated gentlemen. Their stiff wings, jointed only where they are attached to the body, are quite useless for flying. To kill them a man has only to swing a club, and until the international agreement was made, the birds were in danger of being wiped out.

Ordinarily penguins do not come ashore. It is only during the mating season, when they must build simple nests of grass under some protecting ledge of rock or in a hollow in the ground, that they risk trips away from the sea for brief island visits.

At sea they have no need of wings, for they are superb divers and swimmers and they live solely on a diet of fish, sea creatures and sea plants. Icy water has no terror for them because their scaly feathers are an armor-like protection against it.

The penguin has won a wider reputation for being comical in appearance than for any other quality. Its legs, located far back on its body, permitting it to stand erect in quite human fashion, its white breast resembling a shirt front, its black back feathers looking like a dark coat, its doddering walk and its upturned bird face, combine to give it a half-human look.

Fireman Arrives To Learn Own Business Is In Danger

Wheaton--E. G. Worner, driver of one of Wheaton's fire trucks, heard the siren about 11:00 o' clock one morning recently while sitting in his office, the Wheaton Auto Co. He rushed to his car and drove to the fire hall. Upon arriving he asked, "Where's the fire?" He was greatly surprised when informed a car had back fired and caught fire while it was being repaired in his garage. The fire department made its run to the garage but with the aid of extinguishers, the blaze had been put out with only a slight damage being done to the car.

$2,000,000 Set For Seed Loans

Preparations for financing of seed loans under the $2,000,000 seed loan bill passed Saturday by the legislature, are under way this week. Copies of the act and regulations for administering the fund have been forwarded to all county auditors, and county boards have been urged to immediately arrange for financing. The act provides county boards must purchase and distribute the seed. They are authorized to issue and sell bonds or borrow upon county warrants to obtain funds.

Farmers who want seed must make application to their town boards. If the town board approves the application the county board will issue the seed, but if the town board denies the application, the farmer may appeal to the county board, whose decision shall be final. Not more than $300 worth of seed may be issued to any farmer, and only those who are 'destitute and needy' may be granted loans.

Applications must be made before May 1st. The loan is a first lien on the crop grown from this seed and must be repaid before Feb 1, 1936. It may be repaid in cash or kind, at rate of a bushel and a half per bushel. It may also be repaid in labor. The state seed loan fund will be used to reimburse the counties for any losses, and consequently acts as security for the bonds issued by the counties. Application blanks will be distributed soon in all counties that decide they want to come under the act.

Rental of such tax-delinquent lands as are under control of the county by Writ of Attachment, was started at the court house at Thief River this week. The schedule covering the different townships was published last week. There is a very good demand for hay stumpage for this season, and it is expected bidding will be brisk on the different tracts offered for rental.

Following a week or more of thawing weather, several inches of snow fell over this section yesterday. The snow which was heavily moisture-laden, commenced falling about noon. Coming just when fields were entirely clear, this snow will supply the moisture needed for spring.

Regular biweekly meeting of the B. M. Club was held at the club rooms Monday night.

Beautify The Park

Since labor may be made available thru one or other of the government agencies, it would not be amiss if St. Hilaire should undertake a beautification program at the park grounds the coming summer. Plans may be obtained without cost, for making the park a real beauty spot. The ground location is ideal, and cost of converting it from its present wild state would be very little in comparison with the satisfaction of having a beautiful park ground. The first thing necessary would be to submit a sketch of the grounds to some nursery concern that makes a specialty of landscape gardening and get a suitable plan. Next would be to select hardy types of trees and shrubs that would be suitable for this climate. While the results might not be so apparent in a year or two, in course of the next five or six years, St. Hilaire would have a park that would compare favorably with any in this section.

Winter term of district court in this county ended yesterday and the petit jurors returned to their homes. Some of the cases on the calendar were settled out of court, and others were set over to next term. Bad road conditions was the cause of adjournment at this time.

Terrible Dust Storm

In contrast to the snow storm yesterday in this section, parts of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas experienced the worst dust storm in history. In many places people were unable to be out without wearing wet gauze masks, and patients in hospitals had to be covered to prevent suffocation. Some deaths are reported to have occured as direct result of the storm.

No Wheat Restrictions

Orders were issued from Washington this week removing all restrictions on production of wheat in the United States for 1935. As it appears almost certain large areas in districts that normally produce wheat, will experience drought conditions again this year, there will be no surplus even if a bumper crop of wheat is raised in favored sections. A desire to guard against a possible food shortage, is reason for issuance of the order.

Birthday Party

A group of ten schoolmates of Carmen Highland tendered her a surprise party last Friday afternoon at her home, the occasion being her birthday anniversary. A very pleasant time was spent at games, contests, etc., and later lunch was served.

Those present were Ellen Janda, Evelyn Gulseth, Irene Volden, Mildred Hanson, Hazel Huff, Florence Huff, Ethel Carpenter, Gladys Swenson, Mavis Sande and Vivian Lindquist.

With only four more weeks remaining of the session, the legislature is beginning to speed up its work of whipping important legislation in shape for quick passage. Thus far, no agreement has been reached on auto license fees. Tax relief, or rather tax shifting--is one of the hardest problems the legislators have had to tackle at this session.

Several parties have reported seeing crows this week. The northern flight of ducks has started farther south, and ducks are now reported to be plentiful in southern part of this state.

Water commenced covering the ice on the river first of this week. Thawing weather during that time is probably the reason for the river flooding so early.

Highway Department To Employ Farmers

Farmers and teams will be hired by the state highway department to drag secondary roads which will not support motorized equipment during the coming spring break-up. District maintenance engineers thruout the state have been instructed to arrange with farmers in their territory whenever help of this kind is needed.

Included in the 4,500 miles of county roads taken into the trunk system last year are many miles not well enough constructed to hold up standard motorized equipment when frost is coming out of the ground. To keep these roads from becoming impassable, farmers will be given opportunity to maintain them with horse-drawn equipment.

Surprise Party

A number of friends pleasantly surprised Mrs. John Gunstad at her home Tuesday afternoon, the occasion being her birthday anniversary. A social afternoon was spent after which lunch was served by the self-invited guests. Those present were Mesdames J. Almquist, O K. Olsen, A. Dahlstrom, Effie Rolland, E. Johnson, Ben Lardy, Dave Johnson, and Lloyd Johnson and Miss Dorothy Gunstad.

Mr. Boss urges all eligible farmers who have not yet signed applications for contracts, to do so at once.

A five year old son of a farmer residing near Huot, was drowned Monday in a road ditch near his home while playing with an older brother. The latter fell in the ditch first and was helped out, but because of his chilled condition was unable to rescue his little brother when he slipped in.

Those who have wondered how our main residence street got its name, have only to walk its length now to get the idea the early settlers had when they named it Water street.

Since thawing weather set in, the usual yearly trouble with ice filled culverts and inadequate drainage is again with us. Many villagers are finding it difficult to get around their premises because of water that cannot be drained away. Some years back, a suggestion was made that the village invest in a small steam boiler that could be moved from place to place, and be used for thawing out frozen culverts. Such an investment at that time would have been repaid many times. As this is probaby not the last spring that will occur here, it might be well to consider the drainage question the coming summer and provide some means of getting rid of surplus water.

Celluloid and Bakelite

There is a lot of difference between celluloid and bakelite, according to a writer in the Chicago Tribune. Celluloid is made by melting up a mixture of camphor and guncotton. Bakelite is prepared by warming a mixture of formalin and carbolic acid, a process during which a thick gum is formed. This gum is converted into bakelite by subjecting it to heat and pressure. The most noticeable difference between the two substances is the fact that celluloid is highly inflammable, while bakelite is not.

Small Cranberry

The small cranberry, Vaccinium oxycoccus is a small plant some six inches high, with narrow evergreen leaves less than half an inch long and a prostrate rootstock which serves to multiply the plant. It is a native to Europe and Asia as well as to North America, occurring in bogs and swamps. It differs from the cranberry of the larger size.

Carving of Human Bones

Only some fundamental instinct can account for parallel customs among primitive peoples who never met or even heard of one another's existence. For example, one of the most common practices of prehistoric man was the carving of human bones. These carvings have been found in ancient graves in almost every part of the world.—Collier's Weekly.

A Prehistoric City

An entire prehistoric Iberian city was discovered at the base of the mountain of San Miguel in Valencia. Among the remains, to which great value is attached, are ancient vessels, on one of which are paintings of soldiers on foot and on horseback. A complete Iberian alphabet has also been found.

CCC Boys Raise $100 To Help Elderly Pair

Park Rapids--CCC boys in the Paul Bunyon state forest camp are not those to turn a deaf ear to those in need after they themselves have been recipients of help from the government. In spite of their income of only a few cents a week for themselves the boys dug down in their pockets for those coppers last week and laid down $100 on the line for an elderly couple who had the misfortune to lose their home in a fire. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Blanchard, an elderly couple living a mile from the camp, had their farm home completely destroyed by fire. Altho the fire detail of the CCC camp was dispatched and arrived in 2 minutes, it was too late to save anything. The elderly couple were cared for in the camp several days and the boys passed the hat to the tune of $100.

Loses Voice As Throat Is Burned

Princeton--A peculiar accident occured to Lester Thompson, Glendorado, who had his mouth and throat burned so severely by ammonia fumes that he lost his voice. Thompson was draining pipes in the refrigerator plant of the creamery at Glendorado. He thought that all ammonia had drained out of the pipes, and he used a piece of hose to blow into the pipe, and force out some of the oil that was draining slowly. Just after he had exhaled, he took a deep breath and the ammonia fumes came back from the pipe, burning his mouth and throat severely. He was immediately rushed to a hospital where he is improving, although unable to speak above a whisper.

Farmer Shoves In $100 Bill At Theatre Window

It was the first century note Nicholas has had pushed at him in 27 years of the show business. The owner of the bill was a farmer living east of Fairmont. The capitalist was surprised at having his large bill changed, tho it took most of the cash in the house to do it.

Mother Knows Best

By PAUL M. VEST

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

THE two of them attracted considable attention as they entered. Regular nightly visitors at the Silver Slipper had learned who they were.

"Oh, look!" a girl in a green hat nudged her escort. "That's them society swells. Her mother's the De-Peyster society dame, and he's that millionaire rubber man's son. They're engaged. My Gawd, this place is gettin' ritzy."

The millionaire rubber man's son overheard the comment and frowned. He was uncomfortably conscious of the interest they created. It annoyed him.

"Good heavens, Grace!" he muttered. "Must we come to this awful place every night? Whatever do you find of interest here?"

The girl fingered the menu and looked idly about. "Oh, I don't know, Von—there's something about it I like. Perhaps it's the music." Her wide blue eyes were upon the slim back of the orchestra leader.

"Humph!" was the response. "I never knew you to take such an interest in second-rate music before."

They danced a few times, but Von was utterly bored. "I've had about all I can stand," he complained irritably. "Come, can't we go somewhere else?"

"In a little while, darling," she consoled him. Over his shoulder her eyes met the dark, flashing ones of the orchestra leader. A smile touched the violinist's lips—in a moment the orchestra commenced playing the "Rendezvous Waltz."

As the number ended, Grace excused herself. "Just a moment, darling, until I dab on a bit of powder, and we'll gallop along."

Von couldn't carry a tune and scarcely knew one song from another. Consequently he was not aware that every night, immediately following the "Rendezvouc Waltz," his fiancee found it necessary to "dab on a bit of powder." But then Von wasn't a very observing young man. Had he been he would have noticed that the handsome orchestra leader invariably disappeared following the same number.

• • •

In a little alcove back of the orchestra platform, they met: "Oh, Tony. . ." she cried.

He held out his hands to her. In a moment she was in his arms. "Dearest, this can't go on," he whispered. "Break your engagement. Explain things to your mother. Let's have our love out in the open."

She clung to him. "You don't know mother. She—But I promise I'll tell her tonight. And this time I'll not give in to her. . . ."

He kissed her tenderly. "Don't be afraid, darling. What does anything matter so long as we have each other?"

• • •

Tears glistened in Grace's eyes. "But, mother," she remonstrated. "You don't understand. You don't understand—I love Tony. We're going to be married. . . ."

Mrs. DePeyster raised her patrician head and regarded her daughter in amazed horror. "Grace . . . Grace! Have you entirely lost your mind!" she gasped. "Marry a common entertainer in a cheap cafe. It's grotesque!"

"But mother, what difference does it make what he does if we love each other? . . ."

Mrs. DePeyster drew herself up regally, her dark, imperious eyes blazing. "You are engaged to Von and you will marry him. Enough of this nonsense. Mother knows best!"

Grace broke into tears. "But I must at least see him and explain. . . ."

"You'll do nothing of the sort. I'll settle him once and for all. I'll accompany you and Von to that impossible place and put an end to this outrageous affair!"

The wedding was a brilliant social event. Following the ceremony Grace and Von sailed for Cherbourg on a wedding trip.

Back home again a month later, Grace, for some obscure reason, insisted upon visiting the Silver Slipper once more "just for old time sake," she said.

Von groaned. "Oh, that terrible place! I'll humor you this once, but this is the last time—never again."

At their table, Grace glanced disinterestedly at the orchestra leader. How stupid of her ever to have imagined herself in love with such a person.

At first she didn't notice that the orchestra was playing the "Rendezvous Waltz." When she did, she caught her breath sharply. Was that fiddler fool enough to imagine that she was still infatuated with him?

Indifferently, she glanced about the room. Suddenly she gasped and sat up very straight, her eyes on a table tucked away in one corner. The lone woman there was sipping a cocktail and gazing in evident fascination at the dapper, patent-leather haired orchestra leader. It was her mother!

Grace couldn't tear her horrified eyes away. The number ended and she watched her mother leave the room; the orchestra leader suddenly disappeared.

• • •

It was scandalous! It was shocking! It was one of those Sunday supplement things—"Society Leader Marries Cafe Entertainer." The four hundred were aghast.

"Good Lord!" Von gasped at the breakfast table as he scanned the lurid headlines in the paper. "A common fiddler—how could she!"

Grace's eyes were noncommittally on her grapefruit. "I . . . I guess mother knows best, Von. . . ."

Screech Owls Valuable; Devour Rats and Insects

That screeching, quavering whistle which causes farm children to scamper for the friendly protection of mother's kitchen, interrupting their play of an evening after sunset, is the song of one of the farmer's best friends, the little screech owl. Perched in a nearby tree, he is reconnoitering; ravenous after a day of sleep and abstinence he is ready to deal a terrible death to mice, rats, insects and other luckless creatures that fly and crawl.

According to Doctor Fisher, the screech owl is "a diligent mouser, and feeds more or less on crawfish, frogs, toads, scorpions, lizards, and fish. Among insects, grasshoppers, crickets, beetles, and cutworms are most often eaten. As many as 50 grasshoppers have been found in one stomach, 18 May beetles in another, and 13 cutworms in another. The screech owl is fond of fish and catches many, especially in winter when he watches near the breathing holes in the ice, and seizes the luckless fish which comes to the surface. Most of the birds destroyed by this owl are killed either in severe winter weather or during the breeding season, when it has hard work to feed its young. As nearly three-fourths of the owl's food consists of injurious mammals and insects, and only about one-seventh of birds (a large proportion of which are destructive English sparrows), there is no question that this little owl should be carefully protected. — Missouri Farmer.

Friendly Potato Is Not Appreciated, Expert Says

One of the very best foods, the potato, is not fully appreciated, asserts an agricultural expert. For the human body to function properly, starches and sugars are required to produce energy or fuel; proteins to develop tissue; minerals and other dietary essentials, such as vitamins. Potatoes meet the ideal requirements for the body by producing a large amount of energy, some protein, a fair amount of minerals and an adequate assortment of essential vitamins, as well as supplying bulk. The potato is probably our best staple food and one which should fill a much larger place in our diet.

Many persons avoid potatoes because of their supposed fattening properties. This popular prejudice has little foundation in scientific fact. The potato, like any other food stuff is fattening only when eaten in a quantity more than sufficient to meet the body needs. The potato is no more fattening than the same amount of bread or any other cereal. History as well as geography shows that those people whose diet contains a large proportion of potatoes enjoy good health. In Ireland and Germany, where potatoes are widely and largely used, the health and stamina of the people is good and the death rate low.

Invented Original Telegraph

Samuel Morse, the American who invented the original telegraph apparatus, obtained a patent in France; but this was afterwards appropriated by the French government without compensation to the inventor. Eventually he returned to America, and the first telegram was transmitted from Baltimore to Washington in 1844. The original Morse apparatus recorded the dots and dashes on a moving tape, but when it was discovered that messages could be read by sound alone, the tape was abolished and a speeding up of transmission and reception was effected. Even an experienced Morse operator could only deal with 40 to 50 average-length telegrams an hour.

HOW

HYDROFOIL BOAT IS MADE TO LIFT SELF AND FLY.—Lifting itself out of the water, the "hydrofoil" boat doubles its speed and glides smoothly without the usual bumps of the speedboat. Basing his contention on the fact that friction resistance in water is 800 times the wind resistance in air for the same surface, Doctor Oscar Tietjens, a Westinghouse engineer, has firmly believed that putting 4,000 horsepower in a speed boat to make it go 100 miles an hour was wrong. So he proceeded to attach hydrofoils to the hull of the boat that will lift it clear of the water. "Drag" is thus almost entirely eliminated and speed is practically doubled with no increase in power.

These hydrofoils consist of two steel planes, one bowed under the center of the craft, the other a T-shaped affair attached to the rear of the boat; the center lifting plane is about four inches wide and from seven to eight feet in length. A 14-foot craft, having a maximum speed of 12 miles an hour and weighing between 400 and 500 pounds, powered with an eight horsepower outboard motor was used in the tests.

How Antitoxin for Snake Bites Is Manufactured

At snake farms maintained for the purpose of making snake bite antitoxin the reptile is fastened to a table and a glass covered tightly with linen is brought near its head. It strikes the cloth, relates a writer in Pathfinder Magazine, and ejects its venom into the glass after which the remainder is gently squeezed from the glands on top of its head. This venom is gradually injected into a healthy horse until he is able to receive a dose 50 times strong enough to kill an ordinary equine. Then some of the animal's blood is drawn and left to settle. The clear fluid left is the serum or antivenin. It usually requires but 10 or 12 days for the snake's glands to refill with venom.

How Golfers Get Handicaps

The basic handicapping system used by most member clubs of the United States Golf association is as follows: Take the average of the three best scores made by the player, subtract the par of the course, and then subtract 2. Thus on the course if the average best score is 88, subtract the par, 72, leaving 16, and then subtract 2, which would fix the handicap at 14. Greens committees, however, frequently do not apply this rigid formula in fixing handicaps, but vary it because of local conditions or their knowledge of the play of the members.

How Carillons Are Operated

Carillon bells are stationary and do not swing when played. The clappers hang from the inside of the bell as usual, but are moved by a system of levers connected with the clavier, which is played by the carillonneur in a room below the bells. There are three methods to play the carillon—from a keyboard, similar to an organ or piano; from a clavier worked by handles and pedals, and by perforated rolls.

How Hawaii Is Governed

The governor of Hawaii is appointed by the President of the United States with the concurrence of the senate. The Hawaiian legislature is composed of a senate and a house of representatives. Members of both are popularly elected. Also chosen by popular election is Hawaii's delegate to the congress of the United States.

How to Tell Age of Eggs

One method credited to German sources is said to be reliable almost to the day. It consists of dropping eggs into a brine made by dissolving eight ounces of salt to a pint of water. A day-old egg will sink immediately. A three-day egg sinks below the surface, and one five days old and upwards floats.

How Rainfall Is Measured

The rainfall measurements of the weather bureau are made from the common rain gauge, an instrument devised to collect the rain in such a manner that the actual rainfall is magnified ten times for ease of measurement.

How Far You Can See on Water

Actual curvature of the surface of the earth is about nine inches for the first mile and increases at first as the square of the distance. From a point 10 feet above the water the visibility would be about four miles; at 100 feet, 13 land or 11 nautical miles.

How Dice Spots Come Up

Seven may come up in 6 ways; 6 or 8 in 5 ways; 5 or 9 in four ways; 4 or 10 in three ways; 3 or 11 in two ways; 2 or 12 in 1 way. When the caster makes his first throw he has 8 chances out of 36 to get 7 or 11, and 4 chances out of 36 to throw 2, 3, or 12.

How Birth Rates Compare

The birth rate in Russia in 1927 was 43 per 1,000 population, and in 1928, 42.7 per 1,000 population. No later figures are available. The birth rate in the United States per 1,000 population was 20.6 in 1927 and 19.8 in 1928.

Women of Pompeii

The women of Pompeii were in no way behind our belles in the art of correcting their natural defects. Lipstick and rouge were used liberally in those days. But also the men were well groomed and wasted much time on their appearance. They anointed themselves with fragrant balms and essences. There were dandies in Pompeii who in summer exchanged their heavy signet rings for light "summer rings."

Petrifaction

Petrifaction is caused by the infiltration of water containing dissolved mineral water, such as silica, calcium, carbide or others. Particle by particle the mineral replaces the organic material, sometimes with the original structure retained. The best results occur where silica has been the invading mineral matter, and splendid specimens of silicified wood are often seen.

Colors of Babies' Eyes

In an examination of the eyes of nearly 500 new-born infants at Johns Hopkins University hospital, not only were other colors than blue found, but brown was found in 79.5 per cent of the white infants' eyes and 99.3 per cent of the negroes. Many eyes held several colors. Only 28 of the infants examined had plain blu

Queer Livelihood

Apparently, the West has not the sole monopoly of queer ways of earning a living, for the following extract is taken from the census report, an official publication of the government of India, and shows that there are in India such odd professions as those practiced by: Sellers of grasshoppers, Pourers of water on gods, Averters of hailstorms, Suckers of bad blood, Setters of gold nails in teeth, Breakers of dead bullock horns, Cradle swingers, Professional identifying witnesses, Charity receivers on burial grounds, Drivers away of epidemics by charms and Ear wax removers. In addition, the Census tables reveal that altogether there are 37,778, people earning their living as horoscope casters, astrologers, wizards, witches, mediums and fortune-tellers.

"The Place of Killing"

Bulawayo, largest town in Rhodesia, South Africa, literally translated means "the place of killing." The famous Indaba tree, under which judgment was so frequently rendered by Chief Masilikatze, still stands on the grounds of the government house. From the site may be see the hills of Thabas Induna, where executions and timed suicides took place in accord with royal decree. Cecil Rhodes, whose unnamed statue stands in the main street, lies buried at his request amid the Matopos Hills, 27 miles from Bulawayo.

No Indian Name for America

There was no universal Indian name for America before Europeans gave it that name. The Indians were of many tribes and nations, speaking many languages. They had no idea of the extent of the two continents and most of them knew only a few of their neighboring tribes. Tribes had local names for the regions in which they lived, and often other tribes had other names for the same territory.

Dream of Horace Greeley

Summit City projected north of the original site of Akron, Ohio, was hoped to be made by ambitious men the Lowell of the west in view of its water power. Even such an influential man as Horace Greeley sought to make this dream come true but it was all in vain. Its site is now within the present boundaries of Akron.

Ferns Grow Upside Down

Ferns grow upside down at Hamilton pool, reached by mountain road from Austin, Texas. The pool was created by centuries of waterfall over a stone ledge. Erosion below has left a large part of the edge overhanging the pool. The upside-down ferns grow from the ceiling made by this ledge.

Hit-Run Driver Signs Confession

George Shaw, 29 years old, formerly of International Falls, has made a signed confession to being the driver of an automobile that struck and killed Charles Strom, aged resident of Rapid River, about midnight February 11.

John B. Burns, state crime bureau operative, and Sheriff John R. Morris cooperated in the search that resulted in Shaw's arrest and confession.

The statement revealed that the automobile radiator was smashed so that the driver had to be towed by Benny Larson after driving a short distance from the accident scene.

Shaw has served two sentences in connection with liquor running charges and was picked up after authorities first suspected his present employer.

Shaw is out on bonds of two thousand dollars and will appear for trial at the April term of court at Baudette.

Benny Larson, who is accused as an accessory with Shaw, will have his preliminary hearing at Baudette the latter part of the week. County Attorney W. B. Sherwood is sending to Grand Rapids for two witnesses to appear for the state in the case.

The exact content of Shaw's confession has not been made public, but it is understood that he admitted driving the car that killed Mr. Strom and of leaving the body on the highway.

The case has created great interest in the county and outside, and Shaw's confession heightens the interest. The day after he was arrested in Baudette and released on bonds he again was arrested at International Falls, the Koochiching county authorities not knowing of his arrest and release in this village.—Baudette Region.

Early Seeding Needed For High Grain Yields

When small grain seeding time arrives, "he who hesitates is lost", judging from crop trials carried on at the Minnesota Agricultural Experiment Station, University Farm, St. Paul. Getting the seeding done at the earliest practicable date in spring is much more important than preparing the seedbed extra well, says A. C. Arny.

Over a period of years, the experiment station crops men made tests with successive seedings of wheat, oats, barley and flax, beginning with the earliest practicable date in spring and making other plantings after 10 days, 20 days and 30 days. Results showed that both yield and quality are better from the earlier seedings.

A delay of 10 days in the sowing date decreased average yields of wheat 26.1 per cent, oats 11.4 per cent, and barley 17.8 per cent. When the seeding was delayed 20 days, the decreases in yield were 50.9 per cent for wheat, 28.2 per cent for oats and 24.5 per cent for barley. When the seedings were made 30 days late, the reductions were 76.3 per cent for wheat, 55.8 per cent for oats, and 50.8 per cent for barley. Delayed planting cut flax yields slightly more than oats yields. Where all of these grains are planted on the same farm, the figures indicate that the order of planting should be wheat first followed by oats and flax, with barley last, says Mr. Arny.

Six years of work on different methods of preparing seedbeds for grains and for grasses and legumes sown with them, showed that yields of grain on unplowed corn land harrowed before sowing in spring. Disking fall or spring plowed land before seeding did not bring higher yields.

Boys' Hearts Broken As Poisoner Operates

Hector--A wail similar to that of Israel mourning for her firstborn rose in the village of Hector last week. 15 of "man's best friends" crossed the last divide, and the hearts of 15 small boys were broken. A hater of dogs, and one who cared not whose heart he trampled on, dealt death and destruction on the canine population of the village, and 15 dogs were found in various parts of the town, poisoned. Mongrels and blue-bloods fell under the hand of the executionerwho apparently scattered the poisoned food all over town. The murderer will probably never be caught; but he will carry a load around in his heart that is worse than any punishment, and "It were better that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into sea" than that he should break the heart of a boy.

Kicked By Horse And Hit By Sleigh!

Baudette--It is bad enough to be kicked by a horse, but when the sleigh follows this up by giving you a crack on the shins, it's time to call a halt, believes Lloyd Grubstad, Baudette. Grubstad was seriously injured when on his way to help a neighbor. Leaning over the front of the sleigh to correct an error on a singletree, he accidently slipped and fell across the trace chains of one of the horses, a young broncho. The horse kicked him off and as the sleigh went by the bolsters hit him in the back, which will lay him up for a considerable length of time.

Marriage a Rental Device

The ease with which marriage may be contracted or dissolved in Russia leads to numerous marriages of convenience, writes Ruth Epperson Kennell in Cosmopolitan Magazine. Since it is illegal to sublet a part of one's assigned quarters, a lodger might go through the farce of marrying his landlady; a bachelor with a room to himself (a great luxury) would be tremendously popular with girls wanting to marry him, and a young woman similarly fortunate would have to beware of men eager to marry her. So also might an industrial worker with a highest-category ration card—giving him first chance at luxuries like meat, butter and soap—be subjected to the wiles of a husband hunter.

Work of Plastic Surgeons

One of the most remarkable achievements of a plastic surgeon was the entire rebuilding of a girl's face after a motor car accident. P. T. A. Sponsors Summer Round-Up

The Summer Round-Up of the children is a campaign to send to the entering grade of school a class of children as free as possible from remediable defects. It is an economical and educational movement, and all parents of children, who expect to start school next fall, should be very much interested in this Round-Up. All parents of children of this age, in the community tributary to St. Hilaire, are urged to join with us in this worth while project. You do not necessarilly have to be a member of the school district or our P. T. A. to enter your children in this Round-Up. We realize the pre-school period is a crucial time for the child, so it is with the idea of aiding these children, the St. Hilaire P. T. A. is sponsoring this campaign. All records will be confidentionally kept.

We ask all parents to give this project serious consideration. Any information the committee has will be gladly given anyone desiring it.

Bill Johnson, who resides close to St. Hilaire, has adopted a novel method to get some early wheat seeded and at same time get some practice for fall hunting. As his field is too soft to permit use of a horse-drawn drill, he travels across the field on skiis and broadcasts the wheat by firing it from a ten gauge shotgun. The ski marks serve as a marker for each strip, and he knows the pattern of the old scatter-gun so well, he can estimate to an ounce the amount put in each acre.

An attempt by certain parties in this county to secure the dismissal of Game Warden W. Quist for reasons other than inefficiency or neglect of duties, appears to have been unsuccessful. Leaving out of consideration anything pertaining to politics, Mr. Quist is and has been a very efficient game warden. Judging by the efforts Mr. Quist has put forth for preservation of wild game of all kinds, this district would be a loser were he to be replaced.

Governor Olson is to be commended for his unalterable opposition to a sales tax in Minnesota. The proposal to eliminate the state levy and substitute therefor a sales tax and a number of nuisance taxes is not going to bring the relief so sorely needed by farmers, laborers, small businesses, and other persons of small means. It means shifting of the tax burden unto shoulders of those who are least able to pay. It seems like the present legislature is more concerned with protecting those who have adequate means and are able to pay, than in trying to formulate some workable plan to help those of small means who have already been "bled white" in matter of taxation. Governor Olson says "every taxpayer should be assessed upon the basis of means and ability to pay", and a good share of the people in Minnesota agree with him.

Time for Thinking

An excellent result brought about by the times through which we are passing is, I find, a chastened and soberer point of view. It is turning more men to study and reflection than ever before. The scope of the calamity through which we have gone is only now beginning to be grasped. Millions of honest men and women feel this was a catastrophe that never should be allowed to occur again. Then, how prevent it? The answer is: Study and find out.—L. V. Jacks in the Rotarion Magazine.

Need for Co-Operation

Wealth in the modern world depends upon co-operation; ultimately upon international co-operation. Even national trade, national prosperity, is not possible without, among other things, a stable money. But there can be no stable money without international co-operation. We balk at that co-operation in monetary matters, as we do in matters of defense, and in other fields.—Sir Norman Angell in the Rotarian Magazine.

LOCALIZED WEATHER OF VARIOUS BRANDS

The weather that affects us most personally is often that limited to the relatively small space we occupy and may have little relation to the general weather conditions about which meteorologists talk, says Literary Digest.

Significant differences in localized weather can be found in amazingly short distances. One European student of this subject recently found greater differences in temperature between ground level and six feet above it among the trees of a forest, than was shown on official records of "general" temperatures between cities on the coast and hundreds of miles inland.

Knowledge of these climatic changes affecting small areas is especially important to some scientists, especially ecologists, who study the intimate details of the social life of plants and animals in nature. Need for this knowledge, it is reported by Science Service, has caused the development of a new science called "microclimatology." It is the climatology of little spaces, and it is expected to reveal many important facts about the specific weather conditions which human beings, cats and dogs, cabbages and corn stalks, and other small bodies are up against.

DEGREES FOR PILOTS OF MODERN AIRPLANE

If the practitioner is depressed, the layman probably will be overwhelmed before long at the extremely wide range of requirements coming to be demanded of the efficient airplane pilot. Before a meeting of aeronautical engineers a leading pilot of California suggested that unless science simplifies the improvements of modern aircraft, the time soon will come when a man will have to win a doctor of philosophy degree in engineering before he will be able to fly a plane.

Specifically, he declared that "the task of the pilot has increased greatly during the shift to the new meteorology in which he is rapidly becoming adept. The pilot must be able to meet the requirements of extensive blind flying operations and to operate a highly supercharged engine with rigid limitations upon manifold pressure, power and engine revolutions which involve a whole new field of engineering."

Apparently the days when flying consisted, so far as the non-expert could discern, mainly in handling a stick, rudder and throttle, have gone.—New Haven Register.

War on Wishing Well Fails

War waged by Highland ministers against the practice of visiting the famous Wishing Well in Culloden, Scotland, has failed to stop crowds from keeping the old tradition, says the Montreal Herald. The clergy declared the ancient custom is pagan and superstitious. On a recent Sunday crowded buses were run from Inverness almost every hour and there were motoring parties from all parts of the North. Most of the visitors had a drink at the well, then followed the old custom of dropping a coin into it, and silently expressing a wish for good luck. Others placed a piece of cloth on the adjoining trees, also an ancient custom.

The seed grain available here, acording to the survey is 102,000 bushels of corn, 69,000 bushels of oats, 11,000 bushels of barley, 24,000 pounds of millet, 6,000 pounds of alfalfa, and 1,400 bushels of flax.

FARM AND HOME TAXES WOULD BE REDUCED 25 Percent

Replacement Program Would Effect Big Savings Here And Other Communities

Provisions of a tax replacement program which will raise $24,000,000 a year and cut about 25 per cent off of the taxes on homes, farms, and other general property here and in other communities throughout the state were outlined in a communication from the state capitol received today by this newspaper.

The program is the result of weeks of study of the tax situation by tax committees in the senate and house and probably will be the plan adopted by the Legislature, according to F. J. Miller, Little Falls, chairman of the senate committee on taxes, and R. T. Hart, Moose Lake, chairman of the house committee on taxes.

Mr. Hart and Mr. Miller sent this newspaper an outline of the program which has been worked out by sub-committees of the two houses and asked that it be published here to give residents of this community a chance to go over its general details. Only a little time remains of the present session, and the two chairmen decided that a report of this kind would be the only way to reach large numbers of people in the country communities.

Aid For Schools Here

"The $24,000,000 replacement fund provided under this program will be used for two purposes", the statement said. "Part of it will be used for state expenses, so that the state tax levy on general property can be eliminated. The balance will be distributed to school districts throughout the state, probably on the basis of school population, and should make possible an annual payment of about $10 per pupil yearly.

"The state tax levy was more than 11 mills last year. Elimination of this levy and the additional school aid that would be distributed by the state should make possible a reduction of close to 25 percent in the taxes on homes and farms of the state.

Tax Limitation Included

"The replacement bill also will include a statutory tax limitation provision, which will hold expenditures down, and which will guarantee absolutely that any money obtained from the new taxes will be deducted from the amount of the general property tax levy. A bill to control public expenditures also is contemplated as part of the program.

We have adopted a comprehensive, rounded program, which we believe will provide the relief needed without putting an unjust burden on any group of citizens.

Increase In Income Tax

"A feature of the plan is an increase in the net income rates, inheritance tax rates and the gross earnings tax on telephone companies, as the governor has suggested. The rate in the top bracket of the income tax would be increased from 5 to 8 per cent, making a boost of 60 per cent in taxes on the wealthiest group. The increases are graduated down the scale, with substantial increases on all higher brackets.

"In addition, the committees agreed on a series of special sales taxes with higher rates on luxuries and a two per cent retail tax on other items.

"The committees considered the gross income tax but had to give this up when careful study showed it would not raise sufficient funds. Indiana has found its gross income tax inadequate and now is preparing to pass a sales tax in addition. South Dakota gave up its gross income tax because it discriminated against local manufacturers and wholesalers and has passed a sales tax. Only one other state now has a gross income tax.

"The experience among the states that have been seeking new revenue to relieve real estate indicates that the sales tax is necessary to obtain any large replacement fund. 20 states now have some form of it. Combining the sales tax with increases in the net income provides as satisfactory a program as possible for Minnesota, we believe.".

Cities Would Pay Most

Some objection has been raised to the program in the 3 large cities. More than 50 per cent of the retail sales of the state are in the 3 cities, and an even bigger percentage of the increase in net income taxes would come from the cities. Considerably more than two-thirds of the taxes proposed under the program would be collected in the 3 big cities, it is estimated, and two-thirds or more of the $24,000,000 relief fund distributed would go to the country communities.

Judge Orders Novel Sentence For Drunk

Detroit Lakes--Clarence Jenson, who with his family have been on the relief roll for some time, was up before Municipal Judge Fred Dennis, Detroit Lakes, on a charge of drunkenness and His Honor devised a somewhat new and novel punishment for the defendent. The court ordered Jenson to sweep the sidewalks on one of the principal business blocks, and failing to do that, he was to serve a 10 days jail sentence. Jenson took the sweeping job and his activity created some comment until the motivation was generally known.

Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, Involving Panama Canal

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 was signed long before there was a Panama canal in existence and did not give England free use of the Panama canal, notes a writer in the Detroit News. It replaced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 as an Anglo-American agreement of policy concerning an isthmian canal, then supposed to be as across Nicaragua. Public feeling for some years had been growing sore over the Clayton-Bulwer treaty's restriction on the independent action of the United States, and there was grave fear lest congress might abrogate that treaty by open violence, a great blow to future amicable action.

President McKinley in his annual message for 1898 declared that the canal had become a national necessity. Negotiations were opened with Great Britain and a draft treaty was sent by the President to the senate in February, 1900, providing for the construction of a canal, to be permanently neutralized. Disputes in the senate over the terms led to the formulation of a new treaty, ratified as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in December, 1901.

Before the opening of the Panama canal in 1914 there was a controversy with Great Britain regarding the provision of the Panama Canal act of 1912, exempting American vessels engaged in coastwide trade from canal tolls. This was regarded by the British as a violation of the original treaty. Eventually, after President Wilson had sent congress a message urging this action, this exemption of American ships from the canal tolls was repealed.

Hay-Wire Does Not Mean Same Among Lumbermen

Individual in all things, New England has its own meaning for a word used in various parts of the country as slang. Elsewhere "hay-wire" may be synonymous with "erratic" or a "little mad." In Dr. Frank Vizetelly's records of the vernacular the slang use of the phrase "gone hay-wire" is defined as signifying something or somebody "gone wrong." In Maine's North Woods the serious implications of that usage are fully understood.

No greater slur can be cast upon a lumberman's equipment than to say "It's a hay-wire outfit." Hay-wire is used in temporary repairs. The man who thus employs it is foresighted and ingenious, but the man who habitually uses hay-wire instead of making permanent repairs is shiftless.

The hay for the lumbermen's horses comes bound in bales. When these bales are broken the wise teamster saves for emergencies the hay-wire which held them together. A good "toter" would not start his team on a trip without taking hay-wire any more than he would set forth without an ax or a pail.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

To Close-Haul Sailing Ship

To close-haul a sailing ship means trimming the ship's sails when sailing close to the wind—the nearest direction possible to the point of the compass from which the wind blows. When a ship is close-hauled her tacks are hauled close aft. In this manner of sailing square-rigged ships will make an angle of six points with the line of the wind, but fore-and-aft rigged ships will sail much closer. In each case there is always a certain amount of leeway.

Early Motherhood

Child marriage and motherhood still exist to a certain extent in nearly all countries. Even in the United States today, a baby is born to a little girl mother between ten and fourteen years of age on an average of every three hours.—A. P. Claverie, New Orleans, in Collier's Weekly.

Dollars and Stars

THEY came upon the gypsy at the same time. Linda was riding early. Jerry was riding late, and they met at the cross roads. The gypsy was a little stupid looking and very dirty. She look rather blankly from the pretty girl on the bay horse to the handsome man on the roan, and held out a blackened claw.

"Tell fortune?" she asked. "Lady first?"

Linda hesitated, her soft brown eyes alight. She was a practical young person, who wasn't given to probing into the future. Her eyes met the blue ones gazing at her impersonally from the higher horse.

"Shall I?" she asked impertinently. Jerry shrugged lean, broad shoulders.

"Rather foolish, isn't it?" he suggested. "A waste of time and money."

It was the way of ways to persuade her. Her eyes flashed.

"Not at all," she answered crisply. "On a day like this anything might be true." She swung down off the horse and stood, little and slender and smart, near the gypsy. She held out a smooth hand.

"Tell me," she ordered. The gypsy looked more stupid than ever.

"Cross hand with silver," she said flatly.

"Oh, of course." Linda slipped two fingers in her pocket and flushed faintly. She looked up in some embarrassment at Jerry who seemed exceedingly bored. "I have no change," she faltered. "Could you lend me. . . . I'm so sorry . . . just a quarter will do."

Jerry dismounted politely. He fumbled through his coat pockets and handed her a fifty cent piece. As she thanked him, he lifted his cap and turned as if to mount again. Linda spoke impulsively.

"Oh, but aren't you going to have yours told? Come on, be a sport." He stared at her in some surprise. She really was very pretty. She caught the admiration in his glance and looked first surprised and then confused. "Well, will you?" she insisted. "I'll feel so silly all alone."

"Well, in that case—" He got out another coin and flipped it idly as the gypsy started.

"An' those man here, he is man for you to marry; good mind, good body, big heart . . . all yours. It written in the stars."

Linda turned scarlet; Jerry coughed. "I think I'd better be going," he murmured. But the gypsy caught at his coatsleeve.

"Mus' stay," he said urgently. "Caravan moves on ver' soon."

"Still," Jerry insisted, with great delicacy. But—unexpectedly Linda laughed.

"Oh, stick around and hear about yourself," she begged him cordially grinning like an urchin. Their glances crossed and something electric and warm and charming passed between them.

"Er—go on." Linda told the gypsy, quickly. "I'm in a hurry."

The gypsy droned on. "He loves you ver' much but he's proud; high temper. He want you so much. You marry pretty quick. That's what stars say." She didn't give Linda time to speak, but turned at once to Jerry.

"You mus' marry this girl. Never no happiness the stars bring you without red-haired girl. Your heart breaks if you don' take her. . . . Maybe she find another man. Maybe he beg her to marry heem now. Better you hurry." Her tumbled broken words stopped abruptly as Jerry whirled away.

He glared ferociously at Linda. "So you're fooling around with the d—n golden-haired Leonard, are you? If you haven't got sense enough to know who you ought to belong to. . . ."

"Yeah?" Linda stamped a well cut boot. "I belong to you—do I? Along with the rest of the harem. What about Emily and Catharine and Anne Burnett?" She sniffled and her voice quavered as she rubbed a sleeve roughly across her eyes.

Jerry took one stride across to her. "They can all," he said, into the glory of her hair, "go straight to h—l. Marry me, Lin? I want you so!"

Linda clung to him. "Well. . . ." She winkled her small nose comically, "if it's written in the stars. . . . I never would have gotten the old divorce anyway if you hadn't been so indifferent about it."

"Indifferent!" Jerry's eyes flashed ominously. Then he drew a long breath and cuddled her. "Maybe it was partly my fault," he conceded generously, "anyway we'll find a justice of the peace; and this wedding will stick. Good old stars!"

He held his hands to assist her to mount, and the gypsy touched his arm timidly. "Kind gentleman, you promised me ten dollars if I told the lady what you said. Pretty lady, will you pay the five dollars you promised me? It is not my fault you came together, and the caravan moves on."

The two stared at each other. Incredulously, angrily. . . .

"Jerry, you dared!"

"Linda, of all the nerve!"

Gusts of laughter suddenly shook them. They fell into each others' arms. The gypsy looked anxiously from one to the other, and at length Jerry gave her two new bills.

"Stars or cash, which'll you have?" he asked Linda solemnly.

Linda smiled, but suddenly tears glittered on her lashes.

"It was the stars," she said. "It was. We only paid to hear them."

Families Twice in White House

Three families have sent two Presidents each to the White House. The Adams family of Massachusetts sent John Adams to the White House from 1797 to 1801. He was a Federalist. His son, John Quincy Adams, Republican, served one Presidential term, beginning in 1825. William Henry Harrison, a Whig, was President from March 4 to April 14, 1841, when he died. His grandson, Benjamin Harrison, Republican, was President from 1889 to 1893. The Roosevelt family of New York was in the White House in the person of Theodore Roosevelt, Republican, from 1901 to 1909. And his fifth cousin, the Democratic President Franklin D. Roosevelt, was elected in 1932.

What a Million Means

A way of realizing the meaning of a million is to think of what it means in time. Few people realize that there are less than a million days in the whole Christian era; in fact, if we count back a million days from 1933, we come to a date well before the founding of Rome, while a million hours would take us back to the Battle of Trafalgar. The Great war lasted about two million minutes, and, taking the total casualties as ten millions, this gives an average of five casualties per minute throughout the period of hostilities.

Service in Circus Ring

In the ring of a circus in London a church service was held recently. Surpliced clergymen and choir boys appeared where spangled stars performed during the week. Bandsmen in gaudy uniforms played hymns and the ringmaster read a passage of Scripture. The service was for circus artists and employees, and the congregation included lion tamers, trapeze performers, hostlers and others.

Feather In Throat Is Ticklish Business

Sacred Heart-A feather in ones hat may be all right, but a feather in the throat is ticklish business. So thinks little Ruth Marie Thorsrud. A local physician was called to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thorsrud because their one year old daughter had been very fussy for several days. An examination of the child's throat revealed that a feather about an inch had lodged in her throat. The feather was promptly removed and the babe gurgled in appreciation. Just how long the feather had been tickling the child's tonsils is not known.

Dear Sir,--With the spring season just coming on I would like to use space in your paper to make an appeal to farmers and others who may have meadows or brush thickets that they expect to burn this spring to do their burning early before our game birds start their nests. While early burning may not be quite so easy nor effective you avoid the dangers of your fires getting out of control and doing damages to other property. That together with the advantage of not destroying nesting birds should be enough to compensate for the extra work of early burning.

We have spent considerable time and money to feed the birds during the winter in order to have ample breeding stock for the coming season and it is a shameful waste to destroy great numbers of these birds and their nests by careless spring fires. Give us your co operation in this matter. Don't start any fires after the meadows and brush thickets have dried out, nor after the wild birds have started nesting. More birds means less grasshoppers.

Respectfully submitted,
W. H. Quist,
State Game Warden

Legislative Review

(By Senator E. L. Tungseth)

I shall confine my review this week to two important matters which lately have been up for action in the Senate. One of these is that of the so-called Mud Lake Reservation Project. I believe that all the State of Minnesota and not least the Northern section of our State has been intensely interested in this project which will set aside some 52,000 acres of sub-marginal lands in the Mud Lake and Thief Lake area for a Federal Migratory Wild Fowl Refuge. The Federal Government has appropriated $469,000 for this project, but because of legal technicalities it was necessary for the State of Minnesota to acquire title to the lands by regular condemnation proceedings. This required an initial investment by the State of Minnesota, which investment eventually will be refunded back to the State from the Federal Government. No special appropriation was required because funds were available from the Public Shooting Grounds Fund out of which this temporary appropriation was made. The Senators who sponsored this project were Solstad, Rice, and Tungseth. We passed this measure as it came back amended from the house as house file number 965. It has now been signed by the Governor and the necessary legal procedure is already under way and the project has become a certainty.

A second matter of importance is that of rural credit legislation. Just how far advanced such legislation is in the House, I do not know. In the Senate we have introduced a committee bill which embodies major features of all proposed legislation relative to rural credit lands. This committee bill will be known as Senate File No. 1325. Anyone who wishes a copy of this bill may write in for such a copy. It is an attempt on part of the Senate committee to present in compact form all the necessary and important features relative to this matter. Said bill includes some of the features of what has been known as the Rockne bill, but no one bill and no one author has been given preference in the preparation of said committee bill. Neither can any one member of this committee claim that all his proposals have been accepted. Because of the sickness of the chairman I have been chairman of the sub-committee and also part time chairman of the committee and said Senate File No. 1325 has been introduced by me on behalf of the committee. Compromise measures may be necessary in order to concur with final legislation from the house and we trust that any compromise that may become necessary will strengthen rather than weaken the bill.

Minnesota Man Catches Largest Muskie, Trout

Baudette- J. W. Collins, Baudette, has just about cinched the title of being the world's champion fisherman. Already holding the title of having caught the largest muskie on the continent, he was advised last week that his entry in the Field and Stream contest for the largest trout had won him 1st place in that division. The 2 fish are mounted side by side in Collins' home, the muskie being a 56 pounder and the trout weighing 44 pounds. The contest was open to all fisherman in the U. S. and Canada, and it is fitting and proper that Minnesota, "Where laughing waters call the world to play", should hold the record for the largest fish on the continent. The trout which won him first prize gave Collins a tremendous battle and it required more than an hour to land him.

Canvasback, Pintail and Ruddy Are Popular Ducks

The ruddy duck is easily identified by most hunters. They are said to have more vernacular names than any other species of waterfowl—butter-ball, pin-tail, spotter duck, wire-tail and many other names. Recognition marks of the male are: head, blackish brown. white patch on each cheek; upper surface of body, chestnut brown; tail and wings, blackish; under parts, grayish brown. Ruddy ducks are divers and when under stress they dive, then swim to emerge at great distances.

The American pintail is sometimes known as sprig, sprig-tail, whistler, and gray duck. Recognition marks on the male are: Head, brown; front neck, breast and belly, white; back, finely wavy-barred, dusty and white; wing coverts, brownish gray with bar of metallic cinnamon; tip of wings and two long feathers of tail, black. Female: head, grayish white suffused with cinnamon brown spots; neck, breast and under parts, brown barred with dark chestnut; back, same as breast only much darker, with whitish circlets; tail and wings, same as back. Size, slightly smaller than mallard.

The canvasback is ofttimes mistaken at first glance for the redhead. Recognition marks of the male are: Head and upper part of neck, red, followed with wide band of bluish black around breast; back and under parts, white; wings, dusty white with strip of blue-gray at lower edge of coverts; tail and rump blue-black; a V-shape strip of black extends about halfway up the back from the base of tail. Female: Top of head, blackish brown; side of head, neck and breast, brown; other markings, same as in male. These birds have rather long bills of a blue black hue.

Early Prisoners of War Tell Thrilling Stories

Some of the most interesting characters, in history as well as in fiction, are those who have been prisoners of war. During the struggle between the French and the English for supremacy in America, notes a writer in the Montreal Herald, both sides retained captives whose stories, when hostilities came to an end, shed light on an eventful period.

In Quebec, Peter Schuyler was probably the most famous prisoner. He was in command of a New Jersey regiment when the French captured Oswego, and, while nominally in captivity, he had practically as much freedom as any French-Canadian. He kept his own establishment, and it was "open house" for the relief of his own countrymen. He gave large sums of money to the Indians for the redemption of captives, and he not only kept them until they were freed, but provided them with transportation back to their homes.

Monument 36 Years Building

The Washington monument was not completed until 36 years after its conner stone was laid.

Black Gum Tree Immune

The Indians claimed that the black gum tree could not be hurt by lightning.

Snowflakes

Snowflakes are always six-sided regardless of the structure they may assume.

Body Does Own Conditioning

A human body does its own conditioning internally. Evaporation and perspiration take care of the moisture, says a writer in the Los Angeles Times, the blood circulates the proper degree of heat and the lungs strain out impurities. But the body has to take in whatever air it happens to be surrounded by. The purpose of air conditioning is to surround the body with an atmosphere wherein all the cells and organs of the body can work normally without having to strain themselves. It does to air outside the body exactly what the body does to inhaled air. Aside from comfort, it contributes to health, because conditioned air keeps parts of the body from breaking down as a result of overexertion.

Once England's Nazareth

The Shrine of Our Lady at Walsingham, England, is where Henry VIII walked barefoot as a pilgrim. In a few years the ruler destroyed the Priory, confiscated the lands and treasuries, burnt the shrine and executed five of the Priory canons for treason. Another shrine was built in the Slipper chapel, so named because in ancient days pilgrims removed their shoes when visiting it. Walsingham once was England's Nazareth, which brought it immense fame. It was founded about 1061. Like Lourdes, it had its holy wells, and became famous for the many miracles which were believed to have been wrought there.

The Baby's Faculties

The ages when certain faculties first appear in average infants and children vary considerably. Memory and simple consciousness come soon after birth, curiosity at about ten weeks, the senses of shame, remorse and the ludicrous at fifteen months, self-consciousness at three years, the color sense at four years and the sense of fragrance at five years.—Collier's Weekly.

Mrs. O. Sevre Dies

Mrs. Oscar Sevre, age 35, died at the Oakland Park Sanitarium at Thief River Falls Tuesday, Mar 26, of tuberculosis after a long illness. Her maiden name was Rose Rux and she was born in Sanders township, Pennington county, Dec 16, 1899.

She was married May 19, 1922 to Oscar Sevre, who survives her as do five children: Dorothy, Bernice, Orville, Delbert and Darrell. They range in age from 11 to 4.

She is also survived by two brothers, Otto and Max of St. Hilaire; three sisters: Mrs. Lillian Meyer of Riley, Kan., Mrs. Geo. Sheldon of San Francisco, Calif., and Mrs. Simon Buss of Leonardville, Kan., three half-brothers: August of Denver, Colo., Fred and David Rux of St. Hilaire, and one half-sister, Mrs. August Hoch of Leonardville, Kan.: R. L. F. Gazette.

Funeral services were held Saturday from the Immanuel Evangelical Lutheran church near Wylie, of which Mrs. Sevre had been a member six years. Rev. Paul H. Burgdorf officiated at the funeral which was attended by a large number of friends from all parts of Black River community. Pallbearers were Mrs. Richard Gother, Mrs. W. Kitzrow, Mrs. Arthur Zutz, Mrs. Fred Weiss, Mrs. E. Schultz and Mrs. W. Lehrer. Interment was made at the Rux cemetery in Sanders township.

Summer Round-up

The St. Hilaire P. T. A., realizes that good health of growing children depends upon, the development of healthy habits such as adequate sleep, rest, exercise, a well balanced diet, personal cleanliness and healthy mental attitudes. The removal of existing physical defects such as bad teeth, infected tonsils, adenoids, poor vision and impaired hearing. And is therefore sponsoring the Summer Round-Up. The committee will be pleased to talk with any one interested at the P. T. A., Friday night.

Dentist Coming: Dr. D. S. Horn, the Ulen dentist, will be at his office at the creamery building Monday and Tuesday, Apr 8 and 9, to attend to his local practice. Phone him at the creamery for appointment.

Seeding of small grain has started in the territory south of Crookston.

Juvenile Swimmer

A two year old boy will vie with grownup swimmers from all over Minnesota and Winnipeg for popular favor at the Open Swimming championship meet at the Y. M. C. A. pool at Minneapolis this week. The little lad is Pat Cobb, son of Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Cobb, 4914 Girard avenue South. The boy is to give exhibitions of both diving and swimming at the meet. His proud father has taught him how to swim and dive almost before he could walk. His father is a former amateur boxing champion.

The above will be of especial interest to many people here as the lad's mother is Edyth Malmquist, formerly of this place. He is a grandson of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Houske of Rocksbury, and a great-grandson of Mrs. R. L. Hauge of this village. Little Pat is the smallest swimmer at the meet--in fact so small that his swimming trunks had to be made especially for him.

State Land Sale Apr 8

Annual sale of state-owned land in this county will be held at Thief River Falls Monday, April 8th. The sale will commence at 10:00 and continue until noon. A total of 131,000 acres of public lands have been appraised and are ready for sale thruout the state. Last year about 8000 acres were sold at sales held in 13 counties. The sale in Red Lake county also will be held April 8th, but will start at 2:00 P. M.

Auto truckers are having more or less difficulty hauling over roads in the trunk system that have been posted for load limits during spring break-up. As the total load that can be carried on a truck, including the weight of the vehicle, is three tons, most of the trucks can only load less than a ton.

A 19 year old taxi-driver named Rudd, was found dead Tuesday morning along a road south of Grand Forks. His vehicle was later found in an alley in the city. It is believed that the young man was murdered for a small amount of money he carried with him.

Some necessary repairs on the boiler and brick-work surrounding it at the creamery, were made Saturday and Sunday. Arvid Dahlstrom did the masonry work.

Remember the meeting of the P. T. A. Friday night.

Your Home Creamery

Your home creamery is just what cream producers in the home territory choose to make it. By being loyal in matter of hauling cream; boosting whenever opportunity offers, and buying from the creamery the products it has to sell, the plant is bound to prosper and grow.

Several local parties are figuring out tentative plans for financing construction of a proposed new community hall building. There is no question but a well-arranged hall for community use, would be very desirable, and an asset to the village. The question of type of con struction and means of financing remains to be worked out.

WHY

Roan Cattle Technically Are in Shorthorn Class

Live stock authorities point out that Shorthorn breeders have not attempted to stabilize the breed at any one definite color or color combination such as the red and white of the Hereford or the entire black of the Angus and that the roan markings result from a cross of two accepted Shorthorn colors, wholly red and wholly white. Purebred beef cattle, on display that are roans are invariably Shorthorns for that reason, and so are a characteristic of the breed.

But roan cattle, according to a writer in the Kansas City Star, sometimes can be produced outside the Shorthorn family, such as a cross between a white Holstein bull and an ordinary red cow. Since such a cross would not be an acceptable meat animal, according to live stock standards, being termed a scrub or a grade, it is not seen frequently.

The Scots were among the original developers of the Shorthorn as it 's known today and Scotch bred or "Scotch-topped." Shorthorns always have been in demand. The Scots preferred the roan marking to the solid red or solid white, so the roan color is almost a characteristic of Scotch bred Shorthorns, although one famous early-day Scottish breeder produced only red Shorthorns.

Since the Shorthorn sprang up in the district of Durham in England, first being known by the name of the district, and early importations of the breed into this country were mostly roan, old-time farmers frequently describe a roan animal as a "Durham." The technical description, however, should be Shorthorn.

Why More Accidents in Winter Than in Summer

When winter comes people are forced to spend most of their time indoors. And according to a report of the National Safety Council, says Pathfinder Magazine, the accidents follow them right into the home. Excluding occupational injuries, persons are hurt in summer chiefly on the highways, in sports and under other outdoor circumstances. Of course, the hazards peculiar to cold weather help to send the home accident toll up. Chief among these hazards is icy steps and stairs. Sand and ashes should be sprinkled on the steps if the ice cannot be removed.

Because suffocation and asphyxiation increase in the winter months it is well to remember to keep the home well ventilated. Hazards which exist in the home all the year round are falls, burns, cuts, poisons, firearms, etc. In both 1931 and 1932 the total number of deaths resulting from accidents in the home in this country was 20,000, only 500 less than the total number from auto accidents.

Why Portholes Are Round

Although portholes are, as a rule, made round, there are also square port holes. These, however, usually contain a round porthole within the square one. It is much easier to fit something into a round hole and to make it air and water tight. The cutting of the hole, fitting of the metal, glass, etc., has led gradually toward round portholes. Originally these holes were gun holes, which can be seen in the old galleys of years ago, and also used for oars. When there is a square porthole it is usually closed before going out to sea and the round porthole within it left open.

Why Lion's Roar Carries

The roar of the lion is famous among sounds in nature for its carrying quality. The lion always roars with his head near the ground, knowing that the sound will thus travel along the ground a great distance and terrify his prey. Atmospheric conditions would render the sound more readily heard at a great distance on some occasions than on others.

Why Name "Undertaker" Is Used

An undertaker is defined as one who undertakes to carry out business for another. The word was first used in the sense of one who makes a business of carrying out arrangements for funerals in 1698, "the furnishing of funerals by a small number of men called 'undertakers.'"

Why Common Brick Is Red

Legislative Review

(By Senator E. L. Tungseth)

In my last letter I made reference to Senate File No. 1325, which is a committee bill relative to Rural Credit Liquidation. It bears my name because I acted chairman at time it was ready for introduction It contains many of the major features of the several propositions which had been presented to the committee. There are two major features in this bill

(1) Acceptance of cash settlement for farms or loans. Such settlement to be based on a reasonable valuation of such farms as evidenced by records of production the last five years.

(2) It provides for a crop payment plan on farms for which a satisfactory cash settlement cannot be made and also for the purpose of providing postive protection to the orginal owner or barrower, against any competitive bidding on these farms. The arrangement of this crop payment plan is so constructed that the loan can never pyramid. No matter how little revenue the state may receive from its one third of the cash crop, the state will give receipt in full for any and all interest due, in such current year. Anything derived above what is required for interest will be applied on the principal. This plan provides a full security of the tenure for the farmers concerned. The bill does not provide for a local appraisal committee to reappraise and re-establish the salable value of these Rural Credit farms or such farms on which loans have become delinquent. The Senate committee was generally of the opinion that such local appraisals would open the way for a needless amount of expenditures and difficulties, and that a lot of time would be wasted The argument was presented that similar local committees placed the loanable values on these farms too high in the first place.

Relative to the Rural Credits Solstad, Ruotsinoja and I have introduced a bill which if the contents of it can be carried out, will very substantially reduce the rate of interest on State Rural Credit loans I do not believe that these loans should carry a higher rate of interest than 3 percent. It is difficult, however, to secure legislation which simply sets a fixed rate of interest because an appropriation would have to be made to cover the deficit. The Rural Credit Department at the present time pays all the way from 4 to 4½ percent interest on the bonds with which this bureau is financed. There are some $28,000,000 of state trust fund in the Rural Credit Bureau. My bill requests the State Board of Investment to permit these bonds to be redeemed, because if the Rural Credit Bureau at this time can refinance its own indebtedness, money can now be secured possibly at less than 2½ percent. This is because the state of Minnesota has an exceptionally good credit rating. The new bonds can also be arranged in small denominations, in order that our own people might invest their savings deposits therein. If the Rural Credits can be refinanced at 2 1-2 percent, the borrower can obtain his loan at 3 1 2 percent because my bill limits the Rural Credit Department to three-fourths of one percent between the rate of interest paid on its bonds and the rate of interest charged on its loans I can see no other possible way of obtaining a lower rate of interest through this department as added appropriations are to say the least, very unpopular since they increase the tax burden, which the legislature this year is expected to decrease.

About the time that the Legislature had passed the $2,600,000 seed bill, word comes from Washington that such a bill is not required because the Federal Government expects to take care of the situation. In case the Fedral Government does get ready to act promptly in the matter, of course, our appropriation will be unnecessary, but we still have these funds available and in case the Federal Government does not act soon enough to provide the seed for our farmers this spring, then State money will be available. I understand that the necessary organizations for carrying out the provisions of this act have been set up. The Federal loans provide funds subject to regulations which can be used for purpose of seed, fuel and oil for tractors, feed for work stock, fertilizer and dusting or spraying metertials. The 1935 loan follows closely those of former seasons and according to present information is the effect that $500 can be obtained by a single borrower subject to the authorization of the Field Supervisor and the Examination Board. Last year some 12,000 farmers in Minnesota availed themselves of such Federal loan service.

In my next letter I shall comment on the so-called Omnibus Tax Bill, as some progress will be made by that time. The measure passed the House yesterday with a fair majority, but as yet isn't in shape to suit many of the members of the Legislature. The two main things which we must insist on are, (1) That any new source of revenue is replacement and (2) that such new source distribute the load properly so that the public will pay according to means and ability to pay. Nevertheless no tax levy can be expected to become popular. Whatever is done will be criticized and yet we have a plain duty that must be performed in releasing real estate of much of its present tax burdens.

In closing I want to mention that the Governor has signed the bill for compulsory cream grading. The bill received the support of the co-operative creameries throughout the state. I believe that most of the co-operative creameries in my district wrote in in support of the bill and there was little opposition. Needless to say I voted in favor of this bill and supported it in committee. If my information is correct, the State of Minnesota takes the lead and is the first to have such a law on its statute books.

Use Sufficient Paint

It is considered false economy to attempt to save on the number of coats of paint applied for surface protection. It has been conclusively demonstrated in tests by paint experts that two coats of paint applied every four years will give better service than one coat applied every two years.

$40,000 Dam Sold For Ten Dollars

Fergus Falls--A quarter of a century ago, the city of Fergus Falls spent $40,000 building a dam. Last week the crumbling structure was sold for the price of $10 a net loss of $39,990 00. The huge ruin has stood for 25 years as a gravestone to the money invested. It crumbled away like an egg shell after a few months use, and the expensive dynamos are buried under tons of sand and silt. Since the structure was left to mold away, no one has ever made a bid for it until last week, when Ben Warzecxa of Avon, Stearns county, made a written offer of $10. It is not known to what use it will be put by the new owner.

Raymond had reached his fifth birthday Dec 29th.

Camels Imported

About 80 camels were imported into the United States in 1856. During the years 1857-1858, the fitness of these animals as beasts of burden on the deserts of southwestern United States was tested by a march from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific and back. The camels traveled about 4,000 miles. It was considered that the experiment was successful. At the end of the Civil war the camels which still remained in the hands of the government were auctioned off at different times. It is believed that most of these eventually found their way into circuses or zoos.

"Pekoe" in Tea

The word "pekoe" is an anglicized form of a Chinese phrase meaning "white hair" or down. There is such a down on parts of the tea plant in the early spring. Pekoe tea is composed of young leaves, picked while the down is still on them and roasted at a low temperature.

AAA Official's Hog Defies Government

Heron Lake--Charles Winzer has an official capacity with the corn and hog reduction campaign in Jackson county, but apparently Winzer isn't the boss of his own farm, and a hog has politely told him to mind his own business and let nature take its course. This particular hog which has so little respect for the NRA and the AAA gave birth recently to 19 little porkers, and then turned about and thumbed his nose at Mr. Winzer. It would have been more of a sensation if all the pigs had lived, which they didn't, but when a sow has 19 pigs in one litter it's news any way.

People and Trees

Ever notice that people are like trees? Some are like the poplar, straight and beautiful, writes Anna Carlson in McPherson (Mo.) Republican. They are good to look at and they are so busy keeping up appearances that they neglect to spread out and give a bit of shade to weary wayfarers. Perhaps they are unwilling to touch branches with the more common trees. They sap the ground for their own sustenance and comfort and give nothing in return. Then there are other folk, who, like the cottonwood, reach out unselfishly and share with the hundreds who come within the range of their influence. They are not affected by drouths or the winds of adversity because their roots reach down to the fountainhead of the ever-flowing waters.

The Greenback Party

This was a nickname given the American Independent National party because it advocated increased use of greenbacks, restriction of bank issues, and payment in greenbacks of all government bonds except those otherwise specified. Its first national convention was held in 1874 and by fusing with some labor groups it polled over a million votes as the Greenback Labor party and elected 14 congressmen. Soon afterwards its support dwindled and most of its adherents went to the Populist party organized in 1891.

HOW

WORD "O'CLOCK" STARTED IN THE YEAR 1400 A. D.—How people in England first came to say "10 o'clock" instead of "10th hour" is explained by Dr. J. K. Fotheringham of Oxford university in a chapter on the ancient history of hours and days contributed to the Nautical Almanac, official publication of British governmental astronomers for the use of captains at sea.

About 1400 A. D., when the "o'clock" expression was introduced, two different kinds of hours were in use. According to the older system, going back to ancient Egyptian and Babylonian days, an hour had no fixed length but was merely a small part of that particular day or night, measured between sunrise and sunset. Since the lengths of days and nights vary from month to month during the year, daytime hours were longer in summer than winter, while night hours were longer in winter than summer.

About the year 1300 mechanical time measuring devices not unlike clocks began to come into use. These measured all the hours alike, just as clocks do now. Accordingly, everyone had to recognize two kinds of hours. One kind of hour was the old and familiar fraction of the day or night, lengthening or shortening slightly each day. The other kind was the new hour shown on the clock, always with the same number of minutes, regardless of the seasons. To avoid confusion, people stating time in the new clock system usually gave the hour and added "of the clock," later shortened to "o'clock."

How Old Writing Is Revived

The national bureau of standards says that the safest treatment, which reproduces essentially the same black substance as the original writing, is a diluted solution of tannic acid. The exact strength of this solution is immaterial, but approximately 3 per cent—3 grams in 100 milliliters of water. A druggist can easily prepare the tannic acid solution. This can be brushed on, or the documents can be treated in a letter press, using the solution to moisten the cloths. Any iron in the paper originally, or picked up with accumulated dirt, may be expected to blacken, as well as the streaks of rust that are the remains of the writing.

How to Add to Height

The only way of adding to the height of a fully grown man or woman is through proper physical exercises. These make them hold themselves properly, and so using their inches to the best advantage. But it does not make any actual addition to their stature.

How Halloween Ceremony Antedates Christianity

Halloween and the ceremonies that formerly attended it long antedate Christianity, according to the Washington Star. The chief characteristic in the ancient celebrations of Holloween was the lighting of bonfires. The ancient belief was that this night was the one night in the year that witches and ghosts were abroad.

The main celebration of Halloween was, no doubt, Druidical, because the Druids held great autumn festivals on or about the date of November 1, and lighted great bonfires in honor of the sun god as a thank offering for the harvest of the year. The Druids also supposed that the wicked souls that had been condemned to live in the bodies of animals were allowed to come forth on the eve of the festival.

The custom of lighting bonfires on Halloween night survived until recent years in the Highlands of Scotland and in Wales. On the invasion of the Romans, certain characteristics of the celebration of Romans, such as the offering of apples and nuts were introduced into the celebrations of the Druids.

"I HAD the surprise of my life the other night when I had dinner at May's new home. I didn't expect much in the way of a dinner, because May was a newlywed, and never could cook.

"You can imagine my amazement then when she brought in a beautiful dinner, with a juicy tender roast, wonderful vegetables, and topped it off with a cake that simply melted in my mouth.

"I was dying to know how she did it, so after dinner she led me into her kitchen and pointed to a smart-looking, gleaming white electric range.

" 'There's the whole secret of my dinner tonight,' she said.

"But what has the stove to do with it? I asked.

" 'Everything! There's nothing to it when you have an electric range.'

"She then showed me how much easier it is to cook with electricity . . . why it never requires watching . . . and just why foods look and taste so much better. And she told me she paid only half as much for her roast as I generally pay.

"She sold me on an electric range; and when she told me how little it cost, I decided to have one. So I'm on my way."

Let us Prove that Electric Cooking Is Easier and Better

An electric range is so simple a child can operate it. Guesswork, watching, waiting are eliminated. Meats and vegetables cook in their own delicious juices, retaining the valuable food elements. And the Electric Range is CLEAN!

Visit your Electric Range Dealer or our showroom and see the new ranges displayed . . . Or, attend one of our Home Service Department's free cooking classes where you can see the electric range used under actual kitchen conditions.

New Low Electric Rates. NOW, electric cooking is cheaper. New low steps added to the standard residential electric rate bring you cheap electricity for cooking and water heating.

Flock Of Deer Add To Farmers' Worries

Alexandria-One Douglass county farmer has found that the problem of providing feed for his cows and horses has been complicated somewhat by a flock of young deer having made themselves at home on his farm, to graze on his field of winter rye. A. J. Abbott, Miltona township, found 7 young deer grazing on his field. They stayed several hours and then jumped the fence to spend the night in a woodlot nearby. The next morning they were back in the rye. Deer have been reported in Douglass county before, but this is the first time that such a number have invaded the county together.

Head Of Schools At Cavalier Dies

Cavalier, N. D., — W. A. Dickerson, 41 years old, superintendent of schools here, died early Monday from a heart attack that resulted from pneumonia. He had been ill for ten days but continued his work until last Thursday.

Masonic funeral services were held in the Presbyterian church here at 10 A. M. Wednesday with the American Legion in charge of burial rites the same day at St. Hilaire, Minn.

Mr. Dickerson was born at New Maysville, Ind., September 3, 1893, and has taught school in several North Dakota communities before coming here last fall from Ray, N. D., where he was school superintendent. He was a graduate of the University of North Dakota.

Mr. Dickerson was married December 23, 1922, to Mabel P. Weberg of St. Hilaire, Minn., who with two daughters, Shirley Jean and Lois Elaine survive.

Mr. Dickerson was past master of the Masonic lodge at Ray and was active in Masonic work here. He also was a member of the Cavalier Lions club.

He served in the U. S. infantry during the World war as a second lieutenant and also served with the American forces in Mexico.-Grand Forks Herald.

Brief graveside services for the late W. A. Dickerson were held at the cemetery east of the village at 3:30 yesterday afternoon. The service was in charge of Masonic brothers of the deceased. A firing squad from the American Legion Post at Cavalier paid the military tribute to their departed comrade, and a bugler from the same post sounded "Taps" as the remains were lowered to their last resting. Several auto loads of friends of the Dickerson family accompanied the funeral cortege to this place.

Sympathy of many friends in this community is extended to Mrs. Dickerson and family.

Larson Brothers have a fine set of plans drawn and expect to start remodeling of their store as soon as weather conditions become more settled. The store will be double the size of the present one, and will be a decided improvement to the village.

Southern part of the state received a nice snowfall last week. That section needed the moisture while here the need is warmer weather.

No Decision On Tax

No agreement has been reached as yet by the legislature in regard to auto license fees that will prevail this year. Owing to some conditions made in connection with a huge federal grant to Minnesota for road purposes, it is possible the state may have to raise more money for the highway fund than was at first contemplated, in order to meet the federal conditions. It is intimated, however, that the minimums of $5.00 and $7.50 will again be put in force. While no act has been passed ordering extension of time for paying license fees, the general opinion is that the time will be extended to May 1st, and possibly to May 15th.

Auto Show Closed Saturday

The annual Auto Show at Thief River Falls closed last Saturday night after a successful four days run. Entertainment both Friday and Saturday nights was exceptionally good, and most of those who attended were of opinion it was better than at previous shows. The Chevrolet car given away the closing night was won by a party at Thief River.

Vacation Next Week

Annual spring vacation at the local school will be shorter this year than usual because of making up time lost at the beginning of the term. The vacation will consist of three days, Apr 18-19 and 22.

More interest is being shown in baseball this spring than for many seasons past. Teams are being organized in many northern Minnesota towns, and the game bids fair to become as popular as it was years ago.

The one act play "Squaring it with the Boss", sponsered by the Women's Club of St. Hilaire, which won first place in the comptition in this county, was presented Saturday night in the district contest at Warren.

A meeting of the Child Study group will be held at the school house Saturday at 2:00. Everyone who is intertested in this work is welcome.

Martin Gulseth went down to Crookston first of the week to attend to business matters and visit with relatives and former neighbors.

Oppose Sales Tax

Delegations of businessmen from from different sections have appeared before the legislature, and others have voiced strong opposition to the sales tax feature of the Omnibus bill now awaiting action by the legislature. Those opposed to a sales tax all agree it will shift the burden of taxation from those who are able to pay, to the shoulders of those with small incomes who are least able to do so in view of the fact that living costs are increasing.

St. Hilaire Party Held

Following discontinuance of the county system for caring for the poor, and reverting to the township plan, it would be a good idea for the last mentioned units to adopt some of the rules used under the county system. One of these, was that recipients of relief must raise a garden as a contribution to their upkeep. Steps should be taken by the townships and villages to make such a rule, and also to see that suitable plots are provided for those who do not have them. A good sized garden, properly tended, can produce half of all needed for a person's living. Why not let "reliefers" raise part of what they use instead of having taxpayers foot the bills?

PLEATING IS USED QUITE EXTENSIVELY

There is much pleating in use now and it isn't all used for neckwear, although it does seem as though nothing fluffier than neckwear would be found. Ruffles and frills galore are lovely on some and so absurd on others. Narrow side pleatings can, however, be worn by almost any figure, which is not true of the draped polonaise.

The time has come to speak a word in favor of brown. The season is so clearly a blue one that women have been inclined to underestimate the high style interest in brown. During the first showings of the imports for midsummer brown was impressive and something of a surprise for, by that time, women were so happy that it was a blue year.

With the interesting brown and white, brown and grege and brown and beige prints, came lovely costumes in which yellow and brown were pleasantly associated.

Brown Still in Picture as Nifty Summer Color

While it is true that navy and black are leaders in spring fashions for daytime, it becomes increasingly apparent that brown is to be reckoned with. It is an important color by itself and especially in prints, particularly printed crepes.

The brown prints are featured in separate frocks, in jacket costumes and also in long coat ensembles and redingotes, and it's interesting to observe the definite favor shown combinations of plain and printed crepes, featuring brown shades.

A favorite version is the jacket costume with monotone skirt, worn with printed jacket and bodice, and costumes of this sort are attractive when done in polka dots, dots in dime or quarter size. Brown with white is then the favored combination.

The bill, by Representative Harold Knutson provides for payment for the land from tribal funds.

St. Paul—The long drawn out battle to halt Gov. Floyd B. Olson's Minnesota river valley recreational project was tossed into the courts when a writ of mandamus was issued requiring State Auditor Stafford King to show cause why he should not certify a $12,500 warrant in payment of land purchased by the state highway department for the project.

Baudete—The war department approved plans submited by the Minnesota department of highways for a bridge to be constructed across Kelly creek, about one-fourth mile from its junction with Rainy river near Baudette, to replace an existing bridge. Approval was also given plans for a bridge to be constructed across Winter road river near here to replace an existing bridge.

St. Paul—The spring break-up, continuing at a rapid pace, is making it necessary to put a considerable number of new load restrictions into effect, the Minnesota highway department reported. Approximately 3,200 miles of trunk highway is now under restriction. Gravel and earth roads are soft and rutty and frost boils are developing in a number of places. Motorists are cautioned to be on the lookout for rough sections as they may be dangerous if taken at high speed. There are a few stretches that are impassable on account of mud or water over the road.

Little Falls—Camp Ripley, home base of Minnesota's National guard and embracing some 12,000 acres about six miles north of Little Falls, received the stamp of approval from the state's representatives and senators after an inspection trip over the four-year-old project. Guests of Adj. Gen. E. A. Walsh and his staff, the lawmakers took off an afternoon to admire the progress made by guardsmen, CCC workers and emergency relief employes in developing the combined military training field, game refuge and forest preserve.

FIRE INSURANCE

Paying fire insurance premiums always seems like giving away money. You get no return until you have a fire. Then the amount you have paid seems small in comparison with what you receive. For your peace of mind and future security, carry adequate insurance in a reliable company. A policy in the old reliable Continental Insurance Company gives you the protection you should have. Ask for particulars and cost.

Legislative Review

(By Senator E. L. Tungseth)

Last week I mentioned that I would write about the Omnibus Tax Bill in my next letter. I still find that it is a bit early to criticise it too severely as it is not in shape for presentation. However, it seems certain that it will be quite unsatisfactory except for the one feature of offering some relief for real estate and personal property taxation. Sales tax is not my favored replacement tax. Gross income tax would be a bit better and more simple in its operation. Personally, I favor plain income tax, beginning with a very small percentage in the low brackets, letting all have some part in the support of government. Then when income begins to reach the $2000.00 per year and over, increase the percentage tax rapidly. This system can nicely be so constructed that the main load will come on those who best can afford to carry it, which is the only reasonable solution.

Legislation for automobile license rates has run into a snag because of disagreement between the Senate and the House. The Senate bill retains the license rate as it was the last two years. The House bill goes back to the old base of 2.4, but allows a lower minimum than the old rate before 1933. There has been a constant demand for retaining the low 1933-1934 rates. Farmer-Labor Clubs have been busy writing in for the retainment of these low rates. As many of you know who have corresponded with me relative to this matter, I insist that the low minimums of 1933-1934 must be retained, and that the reductions per year for used cars be in accord with ordinary market value of the used cars, getting down to the minimum in not more than six years. I do not favor the former slow 10 percent annual reduction. I trust that a reasonable compromise between the Senate and the House can be affected. We in the Senate had a chance to vote on an amendment to our Senate bill not long ago, but it was the old slow reduction rate Otherwise the rate for new cars, 2.4 is all right. The large number of used car users in my district will not find me voting for unfair rates on these second hand cars.

Notice that the Press today both praises and blames the Senate for retaining a 10 percent reduction in the wages of the state employees. This as compared with the 15 percent of the past two years. My constituents may use their own judgment as to the fairness of retaining this reduction, when it is told that the reduction only affects those that have more than $1320.00 per year. Those who have less than this amount have never suffered reduction. I know that I will be criticised for my vote by those who believe that even relief should be given at the high wage scale But there are only a few people in my district whose wages exceed $1320.00 per year. As long as the most of my people must get along with less than that, I cannot vote for making my low-salaried constituents pay increased wages to such as already have more than these taxpayers When the farmers and the wage-earners in my district on the average make more than $1320.00 per year, I shall vote not only to increase the percentage a bit on those above $1320.00, but also see to it that those in the low wage bracket get a substantial increase.

$1 A Pint Was Charged In 1929 Witness Says

Ely- Spectators and court attaches at the Ely court had a respite from dry proceedings last week when one of the witness unconsiously pulled a "fast one". Edward Boyle, counsel was questioning a witness who revealed the fact that he had served a jail sentence in 1920 for violation of the prohibitions laws. What was the charge at the time you were arrested?" the attorney asked. "$1 a pint," the witness replied innocently.

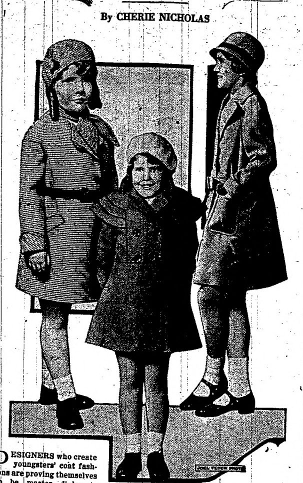
Spring Trends in Children's Clothes

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



DESIGNERS who create youngsters' coat fashions are proving themselves to be master diplomats this season in that they have managed to cater to mother's idea of what a little girl's coat should be in the way of childish simplicity at the same time that they are subtly introducing grown-up suggestions to tickle the vanity of wee folks. And so both factions are satisfied as the spring style parade in childhood's realm passes merrily along in review.

You will agree that it will not take much urging on mother's part to induce little daughter to don as pretty a coat-and-hat ensemble as is shown to the left in the picture. In this coat exactly what we told you has taken place in that there is an air of sophistication about it which will delight any child, while at the same time, from mother's point of view, the garment is as practical as it is good looking.

Let's sort of analyze this coat for ourselves and see if we are right. Well, in the first place, that hint of an epaulet effect at the shoulders, even big sister's new spring coat can do no better in the way of a swagger touch. Ever so many of the newer models are like this, they either have their shoulders cut in this cap fashion or, in some instances, cunning little epaulets of flat fur or fabric which are tucked or seamed or shirred in some ingenious way, give the impression of a widened-at-the-top silhouette.

And the scarf-cravat of self-fabric, have you noticed how one end is drawn through a slot? Of course, just this moment, little missy is standing as prim as you please, having her picture taken, but later on will she keep those little fingers busy pulling the scarf end in and out? Mother knows. Which really is just what is intended—easily adjustable so when spring gets sort of summerish, little ladies can undo their scarfs and throw them back so as to get a breath of air. The belt! Where is the little girl who will not rejoice over a really-and-truly bright-colored leather belt like this one? A matching beret, of course, for aren't grownups doing the self-same thing, having their hats made out of the identical fabric as fashions their coats and their suits? They are.

Another significant message is transmitted via this chic outfit, namely, that it is made of checked woolen, and anyone who knows what's what in cloakings for spring will tell you that checks and plaids are all the rage.

However, not all coats are plaided or checked. The little caped model in the foreground isn't. A soft diagonal wool is its medium. The diminutive postillion cape is fashion's pride this season for children's coats. The double breast closing a la Directoire is good style, too, and is sure to be acceptable in mother's eyes.

Concerning the smart cloth coat on the older girl to the right in the group. It has a very interesting story to tell. It's this way, many designers are exploiting the idea of boyish coats for little girls. Their fabrics have that sturdy masculine appearance which boys like and which is now the style for girls. There are big patch pockets and wide belts, while even the hats worn with them carry the idea of brother and sister fashions.

Disease of Ewes at Lambing Time

Exercise Recommended to Reduce Danger.

Losses frequently occur in ewes when they are confined in close quarters during the last two or three weeks of pregnancy. This disease is called "before lambing paralysis," preparturient paresis, and acidosis.

The disorder generally affects ewes carrying twin lambs and occurs several days before, or within a few weeks of lambing. It is most likely to appear in flocks receiving the best feed. Treatment of ewes showing symptoms of this disease usually has proved of no value and they usually die. However, if normal lambing should take place in the early stages of the disorder, the ewes may recover.

Ewes affected with pregnancy disease usually have no appetite, seem to be in a stupor, and walk with a staggering gait. In the later stages they are unable to rise, appear to be blind, grind their teeth, and lapse into a partial or complete coma. The temperature and respiration of the ewes remain about normal. Death occurs in two to ten days after the onset of symptoms.

Losses from this disease can be prevented by causing the ewes to take exercise. No new cases will develop in a flock after exercise has been provided for one or two days. It is therefore recommended that the hay or fodder be scattered on the ground a few hundred yards from the place of shelter.

Some investigators have suggested that pregnancy disease may be prevented by maintaining a proper calcium balance through feeding roughages of a leguminous nature or other feeds relatively rich in calcium.—Wallace's Farmer.

Cultivated; Cultured

A cultured person is the correct phrase, for the adjective indicates that the person possesses education and refinement. Cultivated may be used to describe the mind of a person, but is not used of the person. One may say, "A cultured person possesses a cultivated mind."—Literary Digest.

Patched Up Camels

The camel's skin never heals from a cut or sore. Moreover, it is insensitive. Therefore the owner finds it both necessary and easy to sew a piece of leather over each wound. After a hard life, many old camels are all shreds and patches.—Collier's Weekly.

Largest National Park

Jasper National park, on the western fringe of the province of Alberta, has the distinction of being the largest national park in the world. Its borders inclose 4,400 square miles of territory, all of it situated in the heart of the Canadian Rocky mountains.

Pork and Hominy

One writer says that pork and hominy first met when De Soto's expedition gave a banquet furnishing hogs from Spain for the meat, and the Chickasaw Indians in whose honor the feast was given, furnished hominy.

Barbara Frietchie

Barbara Frietchie was the heroine of Whittier's poem, "Barbara Frietchie." In it she is represented as a woman waving a Union flag from her window in Frederick, Md., while Stonewall Jackson's troops marched by.

"Kremlin" Means Citadel

The word "kremlin" means a citadel. It does not always refer to the famous Moscow kremlin. There are other noted battlements in Russia, for instance, the kremlin at Gorki, formerly Nizhni-Novgorod.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

A modified living out-of-doors has gradually been developing in places which are not actual cities. It is a middle court between the restricted life of thickly settled districts, and the freedom of country life. Its expression is found in sun parlors, sleeping porches, screened-in verandas and screened-in rooms detached from houses. Roof gardens in cities are a decided trend in this direction, being the only opportunity afforded hotel and apartment dwellers for quick relaxation out-of-doors. When residences have even small garden plots they are often as carefully treated decoratively as the inside of the house so that they lure the family who remains in town to relax outdoors, or entertain under the open sky.

This phase of living has brought into use a definite kind of furniture and furnishing, no longer novel except in the introduction of new styles, as is true of other furnishings. For example, once a Gloucester hammock was delighted in, with its wide and comfortable swinging seat, long and ample enough for afternoon siestas or for sleeping on, in case of torrid heat indoors, or when extra company made another sleeping place necessary.

Modern Improvements.

Today, these are seldom found. The swinging standard hammock, "gliders" as they are termed, have supplanted the Gloucester and couch hammocks. In selecting one of these, the upholstery should be removable or of waterproof material for porches where rain may blow in. Some of the latest models have separate mattresses with cushions for backs, and these can be carried indoors during storms. Others have smart waterproof textile upholstery. If the "glider" has neither of these protections, a waterproof cover for the mattress can be made which can be quickly tucked about the upholstery and be snapped or tied in position. This takes a bit longer to adjust, however, in case of sudden storms.

One of the great improvements in porch furnishings is in these attractive waterproof materials. They come in choice patterns, gay and cheerful as a garden in bloom. Or in beautiful plain colors, heavy and strong, or soft and almost thin. These latter are good for window curtains, while the heavier ones are best for upholstery and cushions. Never before has there been so wide a variety or more beautiful patterns in waterproof and sunproof, textiles for out-door living rooms.

Balance in Furniture.

To preserve the balance between scantily furnished and overfurnished rooms is one of the problems of the home decorator. In the first instance, although the furniture may be adequate, the rooms have a bare appearance which robs them of the needed cozy welcoming character. There is a curious aloofness about the pieces in a scantily furnished room which is sapping to cordiality. It indicates either lack of funds to buy wanted articles, or an institutional trend in the nature of the home decorator. The woman may not be aware of this tendency, but the rooms betray it.

The well-furnished house must be carefully considered, for it should have in it every needed thing, and as many labor-saving devices as can be afforded. It should not be so full that it suggests work to keep it clean, nor should it be so lacking in furniture that it has a bare appearance. It should suggest comfort, restfulness and that home attribute of coziness which is instilled by having loved things about.

Fiddler Robbed, Friends Pay The Bill

Madelia-Fewer bad people and more good ones than in any town in the state is claimed by Madelia. That there is at least one bad one is evinced by the fact that Billy McLaughlin, famous and well-loved old time fiddler, was held up and robbed of $45.75 in cash one evening at 11 o'clock. The following day 107 people signed a petition, chipping in from 25 cents to $2.50 each to reimburse Billy, and a total of $48.30 was raised The nomey which was taken from Billy by force was intended for a horse, on which he had set his mind, so the Madelia folk bought the horse he wanted for $25 and placed the balance to his credit in a bank.

It Was His Mistake; Housewife At Home

Windom — Magazine solicitors who offer to trade their products for chickens are unpopular in Windom. One farm woman noticed a man drive into her yard last week, but not caring to talk to anyone, remained in the house He knocked, without any response, then peered into a couple of windows. When he was satisfield no one was home, he went into the chicken house and pulled a hen from her roost. The lady decided things had gone far enough, and called out from the house. The man stammered a bit but explained that he was only taking it to the car to compare it with some he had taken in previously in exchange for magazine subscriptions. Apparently the man occasionally took a chicken without making a trade, and the sheriff is looking for him.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

GLASS is invading the realm of interior decoration. Never before has it taken quite the place it does now, although it has had repeated revivals. Today even the walls of a house may glint from tiny filaments of spun glass introduced into the wall paper together with similar filaments of metals to give a burnished surface. Mirrors have returned in all their glory and are hung to duplicate beautiful portions of rooms, or of bough, branches and landscapes glimpsed through windows. It is easy to see that the positioning of mirrors is important to bring out the desired reflections for beauty or for impressions of space.

Mirror doily reflections of vases, usually of silver or glass, and flower-filled, give added attraction to tables, since the arrangement is in duplicate. These table mirrors are fascinating dining-table centerpieces as fleeting visions of those seated across the table are often caught, adding to the jollity of an occasion, or permitting swift, unspoken messages to be exchanged. It is true that these are matters apart from the decorative function of the doily mirror which is to reflect the ornamental centerpiece standing on it, but interest is added just the same. Dolly mirrors come in round, oval, etc., shapes merely beveled at rims, or with dainty etched decorations on the glass. These mirrors are again in high favor after a lapse of several years.

Collector's Glassware.

Glassware is still in the ascendency as a collector's hobby. It results to the advantage of interior decoration as many of the pieces take their places on mantelpieces, tables, sideboards, and also on glass shelves in windows. The light shimmers through the transparent crystal white or colored surfaces in a gay and enticing fashion. Many of the pieces can be of genuine practical use, serving as vases, salad bowls, cream pitchers and sugar bowls, compotes, etc., if not for everyday use at least on occasions. Whether used for ornament or service, the decorative element is present.

Glass desk sets and book ends are popular, although breakable and requiring what we may call "special handling." The cleaning is an item, for crystal must be polished to be at its best, whether it is crystal glass or rock crystal. However, the glass for these things is not delicate nor fragile, but of size and shape to insure its being as durable as possible. We have long been accustomed to glass ink-wells and paper weights, but we are not so familiar with glass book ends, paper cutters, and letter holders. Novel they are and handsome, whether in plain solid blocks or molded and chiseled or cut and engraved. Speaking of cut glass, its vogue is becoming more and more in evidence each season.

Cut Glass Comes Back.

Cut glass is returning to favor. It may be said that it has always been in fashion since very light cutting has been in style during the many years when deep cut glass was demode. But the cutting was so very delicate that it made little impression on the surface of the glass, and also but little impression of cut glass in the minds of purchasers. Etched glass has been in higher favor than cut glass.

Two designs are especially featured —pineapple and star cutting. Cut-glass goblets come in all sizes from the very small wine-glass size to the large water goblets. The cutting on this stemware has to be completed on the sides of the glass, for the rims must be polished smooth.

IRON DEMANDED BY BLOOD CELLS

Certain Foods Will Give You Necessary Supply.

By EDITH M. BARBER

HAVE you had your iron today and yesterday and the day before? If you habitually have been using eggs, spinach, potatoes, whole grain cereals or bran, dates, prunes, beans, particularly dried beans, peas, lentils, nuts, meat, especially kidneys and liver, fish and oysters, and if you have been using molasses, you have been getting a full supply of iron. Other fruits and vegetables contain enough iron to make them valuable. A very tiny amount of iron by weight is needed daily, but lacking that minute quantity, every cell of the body, including the red blood cells, is being deprived of an essential.

We use iron with every breath we take and as very little can be stored from day to day, we must renew our supply regularly. To fully utilize iron, copper, one of the other minerals, and possibly manganese, must be present. Fortunately we find that most foods which supply iron have these other materials in varying amounts.

It is also possible for the body to make use of iron in an inorganic form so that now doctors prescribe for persons who show an anemia, a scientific iron "tonic." To prevent this condition is of course to make sure that we get a liberal supply of food high in iron in our daily diet, and the best way to do that is to follow that statement which I have made so often in this column—a good varied diet for the sake of well being.

Spinach Salad.

2 cups cooked spinach
2 hard-cooked eggs
French dressing

Chop the cooked spinach. Chop separately the whites and the yolks and arrange them, mixed in little mounds, on the spinach. Pour a well-seasoned french dressing over the salad and garnish with lettuce leaves.

Liver and Mushrooms.

1 pound beef or pork liver
2 tablespoons chopped onion
3 tablespoons drippings
2 tablespoons flour
½ cup sour cream
1 teaspoon salt

Wipe liver, remove skin and cut into cubes. Brown with onion in the hot fat and cook gently for five minutes. Stir in flour and add cream, seasonings, stock and mushrooms. Cook until sauce thickens. Add more liquid if needed. Serve in large cream puffs or on toast as a main course for a luncheon.

Add seasonings and pour into buttered timbale molds or custard cups. Bake in a slow oven (325 degrees Fahrenheit) until firm, about thirty minutes. Turn out on to a hot platter and sprinkle each timbale with strained egg yolk. Serve with tomato or cream sauce to which the chopped whites have been added.

¾ cup milk
1 egg

Use same method of mixing for two recipes. Mix together dry ingredients. Beat egg slightly and mix with liquid. Add all dry ingredients at one time to liquid to prevent lumping. Pour into greased muffin pans and bake in medium oven (375 degrees F.) about twenty-five minutes. Increase heat if necessary for browning during the last ten minutes.

Couple Celebrate 73rd Wedding Anniversary

Granite Falls — Mr. and Mrs. George E. Olds, Granite Falls, celebrated their 73rd wedding anniversary March 30, but to them this day was nothing unusual and they laughed at the idea that they should make a special occasion of it. Friends dropped in to pay their respects, but otherwise it was just another day to the elderly couple. Mr. Olds will be 100 years old in another two months, and Mrs. Olds is now 95. After a married life of close to three quarters of a century, during which time the country has seen many ups and downs, Mr. Olds sees nothing in the present to justify alarms, and feels that everything will pull through as it has in the past.

New Keyless Lock for Door or Desk Invented

Leipzig.—A new form of lock makes it possible to fasten the door of your home, or of a room or desk, securely, and open it without the use of a key. The new keyless lock is a simple application of the principle of the combination lock heretofore used on safes. Instead of inserting a key, one merely twists a dial on the door, to the right number and pushes a button, when the door swings open. There is no need to lock the door, since the bolt is sprung automatically when you close it.

Extend Auto License Payment To May 1st

Governor Olson has signed a bill extending the time for payment of auto licenses this year to May 1. With a few changes which will mean higher fees for new and the more expensive cars, the fees will not be much different than has prevailed the past two years: As only two weeks remain in which to obtain licenses without payment of penalty the license department of Secretary of State Mike Holm faces a stupenduous task to handle all applications expected during that period.

Farewell Party

Members of the Oakland Park Sanatorium commission and their wives attended a farewell party at the Sanatorium last Friday evening in honor of Dr. and Mrs. B. C. Bernard, who departed this week to make their home at Gulfport, Miss.

Following a sumptuous dinner served at 6:30, individual members of the commission gave short talks, expressing their appreciation of the fine service given by Dr. and Mrs. Bernard at the institution, and wishing them happiness in their new home. On behalf of the commission, Dr. O. F. Mellby, its president, presented Dr. and Mrs. Bernard a fine linen table set as a token of remembrance and esteem from their Minnesota friends.

Rain Saturday night which turned into snow, caused unseasonably cold weather in this part of the state. A high wind from northwest added to the discomfort caused by lowered temperatures. Practically all snow disappeared by Monday noon.

The present session of the Minnesota legislature will close next week. Much work remains to be done, and it is expected there will be quite a scramble during closing hours.

Following reports of heavy crop damage in areas where dust storms prevailed recently, the price of wheat has advanced.

Miss Loretta Kruse came down yesterday from Thief River Falls for a visit at the Gigstad home and with other friends.

Some local men are hoping that summer will come on Sunday this year so they can go fishing.

More Land Farmed

Pennington county has over two hundred more farms in 1935 than it did in 1930, according to the preliminary announcement sent out by C. W. Bouvette, supervisor of the agricultural census for the Ninth district. The totals are 1,304 for 1935 as compared to 1,100 in 1930.

Black River shows a gain of 7 farms, Bray 3, Polk Center 1, River Falls 10, Rocksbury 20, Wyandotte 1, Sanders 6, and St. Hilaire village 2. The township of North shows a gain of 49, the largest in the county.

Highway Patrol

A bigger highway patrol force with wider powers is provided for in a bill that has passed both houses of the legislature.

The patrol would be increased from 70 to 100 men, and they would be given police power on trunk highways. There is some objection from organized labor who fear the patrol may be used against them in case of strikes. While there is no doubt a larger force is needed, there is possibility the governor may not approve the bill.

Seeding Started

Some grain has been seeded in the higher land west of here, and if favorable weather continues it is expected seeding will become general next week. Instances have been reported where grain was seeded in this locality as early as ten days ago. ground is in best of condition, and everything looks favorable for a good crop.

When the new train schedule goes into effect Monday, the postoffice will open at 8:00 in the morn- and will close at 6:00. This will give sufficient time for dispatching of mails both north and southbound.

If prospects for 1935 continue favorable, there will be much building, remodeling and repair work done in this locality this year. Three or four farmers plan building new barns, and there is much long-deferred repair work to be done on existing buildings.

After breaking open during the latter part of March, remaining ice in the river channel went out last Thursday afternoon.

Regular monthly meeting of the school board was held at the school building Tuesday evening.

Propose Truck Line

Another trucking concern has made application for permission to establish a freight truck line thru here. At meeting Monday evening of the Businessmen's Club, the matter came in for discussion, and the general opinion was that establishment of truck service would serve no useful purpose. In connection with the new passenger service about to be put into operation by the Great Northern, the railroad proposes to furnish one-day freight service from the Twin Cities by attaching a fright car to the early morning mail train. Freight leaving Minneapolis at 11:00 at night would thus be delievered on this line the following morning. Such a service could not be be improved upon.

G. N. Makes Change In Train Schedule

Effective Monday, April 22nd, a change in the passenger train schedule on this line will be made by the Great Northern. The Warroad train will leave Crookston immediately after arrival of the Minneapolis train which carries bulk of the mails. If the latter train is on time at Crookston, the local passenger will reach here at 9:34 A. M., instead of near noon as at present. There will be no change in schedule of the southbound train.

This change will be of much benefit to rural patrons as it will enable carriers to wait for and deliver each day's mail. First class mail and daily papers that leave Minneapolis during late evening will thus arrive here at 9:34 the next morning. The change will be of material benefit to towns farther north where time between train arrivals, under present time tables, does not permit answering of mail on the same day it is received.

With the village and township co-operating, some improvement should be made this year on the road leading from the south bridge to the cemetery, and possibly south to the ditch grade. Leveling down of the hill at the Benson creek, widening of the creek culvert, some grading and gravelling is badly needed. Considering the amount of traffic over that particular stretch of road, its improvement is more than justified. At present it is in very little better condition than when laid out over forty years ago.

Easter Gifts

WITH EASTER at hand all sorts of alluring gift suggestions burst forth in early springtime splendor. This is the season of the year for surprise presents chosen from the charming array of gift ideas the beauty field offers, says a fashion writer in the New York Herald-Tribune.

Perfume is always a delightfully appropriate present, particularly at this time of the year. Besides, the atmosphere of early spring spells enchantment—a certain new romance in living, especially identified with perfumes and spring fragrances.

Some alert perfumers, to meet the various holiday requirements, are presenting bright and decorative Easter eggs. Gayly colored papier mache "eggs" of red, green, blue, white and yellow contain one or more attractively decorated bottles.

Other firms whose perfumes suggest "Evening and Springtime in Paris" (certainly quite in keeping with this April season), also offer Easter egg packages. These French perfumes are presented in egg-shaped containers of metal with the familiar little sapphire blue and silver bottle resting snugly in one half of the "egg." Here you have a choice of blue, red, green, orchid, pink and pale blue. Certainly a variety of Easter colors!

Easter Vanity Boxes Are Filled With Surprises.

Powder compacts make a welcome gift. One cosmetic house presents a particularly gay and springlike compact in chromium finish with a pearl gray enamel top, embellished with a basket of bright colored flowers. Just the right note for spring!

A certain New York shop offers a gala display of vanity cases, jeweled compacts and brilliantly decorative lipsticks to match new spring ensembles. The vanities come in black enamel for evening wear and silver for daytime and sport. They are filled with surprises! Powder, rouge, two lipsticks (in daytime and evening shades), a little comb. Quite a compact Easter package, to say the least.

But one novelty compact, popular in the beauty field, is one which is skillfully designed to hold a key. Here beauty combines with the practical, and eliminated are those moments of fumbling in one's pocketbook for the key. The compact will hold any cylinder key. You simply slide the little knob at the top of the case to push out the key. The compact comes in two styles, a double and single compast in assorted enameled colors. You are able to use your own favorite powder, for the cases are made for loose powder. Such a novel vanity would be a delightful gift.

Strange Easter Customs

THERE'S a lot more to Easter than displaying finery.

Take Scotland, for instance. Lads and lassies there cavort in an Easter spirit alleged to be typical of their country—at expense to none. They get hard-boiled, dyed eggs (once fresh, it is hoped) and playfully roll or throw them at each other. And when they are through with their rolling and throwing, they eat the by-that-time-battered remains.

But the old-timers in Lancashire, Cheshire, Staffordshire and Warwickshire were different. They played a lifting and heaving game. On Easter Monday the men lifted or heaved the women. How far or for what history fails to record. On Easter Tuesday the women, having the last word, lifted or heaved the men. And all this was a very serious matter.

To explain the lifting and heaving, the maneuver was performed by two lusty men or women joining their hands across each other's wrists. Then, making the person to be heaved sit down on their arms, they lifted or heaved him aloft two or three times and often carried him several yards in the street, the distance, of course, depending on the avoirdupois of the victim, London Tit-Bits records.

Even clergymen were unable to escape the heaving or lifting. It so happened a very austere minister was passing through a town in Lancashire on an Easter Tuesday. It was all he could do to uphold his professional dignity when three or four husky women ran into his room, exclaiming they had come "to lift him."

"To lift me," repeated the amazed divine. "What can you mean? Is there any such custom here?"

"To be sure," they chorused. "All us women was lifted yesterday and us lifts the men today in turn."

The reverend traveler, it is recorded, saved his position by bribing them with a half crown and scurrying off on his mission.

In Durham on Easter Monday history says the men claimed the privilege of taking off the women's shoes, and the next day the women came right back in a turn-about's-fair-play manner.

History again fails us, for it does not say what "kick" they got from taking off each other's shoes.

At Hungerford in Berkshire during Easter a young man is perfectly entitled to claim a kiss from every pretty girl he meets between noon and 6:00 p. m.

One of the curious customs of the day was that which centered in the distribution of what was known as the Pax or Peace cake. Until very recent times persons who had quarreled were invited to share such a cake, say "peace and good will" and "make up."

Priests in England a few generations ago used to make small crosses of palms which they gave to their congregations. At the shrine of Our Lady, Nantswell, Cornwall, the people developed a ceremony of dropping these symbols into the holy well to test their luck—if the crosses floated, good fortune might be expected; if they sank, death and disaster would be forthcoming.

British schoolboys, it is recorded, long made it a practice to carry blossoming willow branches through towns and villages on Palm Sunday, and even since the World war it has been a custom for London residents to visit the country and bring back flowering boughs on the day of palms.

Lives On Same Farm 70 Years

St. Cloud--Seventy years on the same farm is the record hung up by Henry Wiegand, Clearwater township resident, who died last week. Mr. Wiegand was born in the east 89 years ago, coming to Wright county in 1865, at the end of the Civil war, and remaining on the same homestead ever since. He was a substantial farmer, content with operating his farm and taking an interest in his comunity and church. He had been ill for the last year.

"Buster" Real Rat Poison

Red Wing-- If the Pied Piper was active in this day and age he would fine plenty of competition in driving away rats with "Buster", a small fox terrier owned by Joe Schlundt of Hay Creek. The terrier, it is reported has established the record of slaughtering 75 rats on the Schlundt farm a few days ago. Not satisfied with the record he went to the Joe Persig farm where he disposed of 117 of the rodents in short order. Only two rats escaped the little terrier in his campaign at the Persig farm.

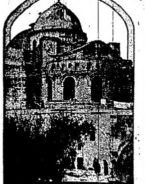
THE thoughts of the Christian world at the approach of Easter inevitably turn to the Holy City and the scenes of the last hours of the Savior.

Jerusalem is built on a rocky hill rising 2,500 feet above the Mediterranean. It is fourteen miles distant from the Dead sea, the waters of which in clear weather are visible from it, with behind them the somber mountains of Moab. Its name, observes a writer in the Montreal Herald, occurs first in history on one of the tablets found at Tel-el-Amarna, in Egypt, the date of which is about 1400 B. C., containing a letter written by a prince ruling Jerusalem under Egyptian suzerainty. On the tablet the name is spelled Urusalem, which is believed to mean "city of security" or of "peace."



The Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

The Biblical history of the city is familiar to all. Melchizedek, who blessed Abraham, appears in Genesis as "King of Salem." The second verse of the Seventy-second psalm identifies Salem and Jerusalem or Sion, but the story of Melchizedek is so obscure that no one can say when the Holy City had its beginning. Egypt held it for a time, but about 1400 B. C., the Jebusites, a tribe of Canaan, captured and held it for many years. David captured it from the Jebusites about 1000 B. C and made it the capital of his kingdom, and there Solomon built the temple where now stands the exquisite Mosque of the Rock. Since David's time the city has changed hands 24 times, being destroyed and rebuilt again almost as often. But it seems indestructible. Nebuchadnezzar may deport its people; Titus may plow its site and sow it with salt; Hadrian may efface its name by planting on its foundations the Roman colony of Aelia Capitolina; but its memory is restored, its ancient sanctuaries are adorned by new temples and still it stands.

The ancient city is a little more than a square mile in area. It is surrounded by a low wall, inside which things are much as they have been for hundreds of years. All around it is the great new city, modern and lively, dotted here and there by the big religious and charitable foundations built during the half-century before the war by the various Christian churches. They provide some of the most conspicuous features in the landscape, such as the Russian cathedral, with its onion-shaped dome, the convent on the Mount of Olives and the barrack-like hospice of Notre Dame de France.

The great interest in Jerusalem, at this holy season, is not, however, in its modern aspect, striking as it is. Unique among all cities of the world, Jerusalem is a holy city to three great faiths, Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism. Monuments to the great beginnings of all three are there and now after many centuries of bitterness, all three may worship unhindered at its shrines.

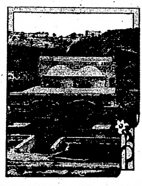
To Christians, the most poignant of the many tragedies of Jerusalem is the Crucifixion of Jesus, which many believe took place nineteen hundred years ago. Reverent research has ascertained with fair certainty the scenes of the last fateful days.

In the wall of Jerusalem there is still to be seen the famous Golden Gate, through which Jesus is said to have entered on Palm Sunday, when the people shouted "Hosanna!" and flung palms in his path. It is also thought to have been the Gate Beautiful, mentioned in The Acts. The masonry is Byzantine, but it is believed to hide older work. It is kept walled up, perhaps by reason of a tradition that on a certain Friday a Christian conqueror would enter by it, ending Turkish rule forever.

The first Church of the Holy Sepulchre was built, after a careful search for the true site, by Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, and dedicated in 336. It was later destroyed by fire, as were several successors, the present building dating from 1810. The dome was completed in 1868. The present building is not large and is constructed of a red and yellow stone, something like marble. Inside, opposite the entrance, is a small door, through which one, by stooping, may enter the Holy Sepulchre. It is a small room, six feet by seven and seven and a half feet high. It is brilliantly lighted by forty-three lamps kept burning by the Roman, Greek, Armenian and Copt churches. Floors, walls and ceiling are covered with marble to protect the rock from pilgrims who might chip it.

The Garden of Gethsemane was a beautiful spot on the side of the Mount of Olives, across the Brook Kedron, to which Jesus and his disciples frequently repaired for rest and refreshment. Formerly, no doubt, much larger, it is now a plot about one hundred and ninety-five feet square. There are in it seven olive trees, the largest being about twenty-six feet in circumference. If they are not the original trees that witnessed the Agony of Jesus in the Garden, they are certainly off-shoots of them. There is definite knowledge that the trees had been in existence for a long time in the Seventh century. To the east of the garden is a rocky mass where the apostles are said to have waited while Jesus prayed.

The chief Moslem sanctuary of Jerusalem, the Haram-es-Sherif, built on the site of the temple, can only be visited by Christians with special permission, and on certain days they are not permitted to enter it. Under the Mosque of the Rock, which stands in the Haram enclosure, is shown the sacred rock where Abraham is said to have made Isaac ready for sacrifice, and there, too, is the cavern in which David is said to have prayed. There is also a round hole in the rock which is traditionally reported to have been made by Mohammed's head as he ascended to heaven.



Sealed Golden Gate Where Christ Entered Jerusalem.

The temple, which was begun by Herod the Great, father of the Herod who beheaded John the Baptist, was still in process of building during the life of Jesus. Its beauty and the splendor of history and religious idealism it symbolized and enshrined affected the heart of Jesus as it did every other Jew. No other city in the history of the world has gained the passionate affection of a people as has Jerusalem. Brooding over it in the last days Jesus uttered that most moving apostrophe, "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!"

Lonely John, dreaming on rocky, sea-swept Patmos, of a "new heaven and a new earth," instinctively thought of "the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven. . . . And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there. And they shall bring the glory and honor of the nations into it."

"The Lord Is Risen"

By DIANA KEARNY POWELL
In Washington Post

THE Lord is risen! See the cave,
The sepulchre St. Joseph gave—
The fast-sealed rock is rolled away,
Come see the place where Jesus lay.
Satan is conquered, and the grave.

Though faith is scorned by fool and knave,
Though thieves may mock and rabbles rave,
Still do we hear the angel say,
"The Lord is risen!"

You who of sin have been the slave,
Be free, for He who came to save
Has conquered death this Easter day.
Join with the angels as they pray,
Sing with the birds, the wind, the wave,
"The Lord is risen!"

The board estimates that the entire restoration program will mean payment of $750,000 in labor costs alone.

Minneapolis — Northwest farmers, demanding seed immediately for planting their 1935 crops but encountering dangerous delays in getting federal seed loans, have a new source of help open to them—the rural rehabilitation division of the federal emergency relief administration. The seed stocks committee of the FERA, in addition to furnishing seed to farmers who last fall applied for seed grants, will arrange to distribute its surplus among other farmers who did not apply but now can show they are unable to secure loans of government seed funds. The committee purchased over 19,000,000 bushels of wheat, flax, oats and barley seed for distribution in the northwest.

Winona—Planting of 160,000 trees within the federal soil erosion demonstration area in Gilmore valley has been launched by the local unit of the erosion service which maintains offices here. Two crews of 25 men are now engaged in preparing the land for this big tree planting program. The crew will be increased to approximately 50 men with the start of planting. It will take about one month to plant the trees. The area reforested, if it was in one lot, would total about 125 acres.

St. Paul—At least $100,000,000 will be granted Minnesota as the state's share of the federal government's $4,800,000,000 work relief fund, it was estimated here. The huge sum will be in addition to the $21,000,000 already allocated the state for highway and grade crossing projects, it was indicated. With allocation to states expected to be made shortly, the state planning board will name a committee to select those of the 1,847 projects suggested by the state's political subdivisions to be apportioned shares of the fund.

"Blue Fox" Captured
By Annandale Dog

Annandale--A "blue fox" was captured last week near Annandale, and Clarence Sonsteby has a curiosity which is causing considerable interest. Aroused early one morning, Sonsteby went out into the yard to find his dog fighting with some kind of wild animal. It was impossible in the dim light to tell what it was, but the dog had exhausted his opponent, and Sonsteby threw the animal into a coop. Local sportsmen, called in the next morning, after considerable discussion decided it was a blue fox. The animal apparently appears to be somewhat tame, as it is contented in the pen and drinks milk readily.

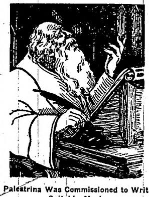
Easter Music

IF CHRISTMAS is the greatest day in the year for children, Easter holds a similar position for the adult members of the race. The world prepares to welcome it with hymns, psalms and spiritual songs, wherever the light of Christianity has penetrated.

It is a festical of far greater antiquity than Christmas, and at one time marked the dawn of a new year. The vernal equinox occurs about the 21st of March, when winter ends, and spring introduces the coming summer.

The oldest records of history tell that Easter was always a religious festival, though far more ancient than Christianity. Bonfires were kindled in Rome and the sacred fire in the temple of Vesta was renewed on the 1st of March each year. Similar customs prevailed in Germany and England. These customs lingered in certain parts of the British Isles into the Nineteenth century. In Scotland they were called the Need Fires, which were produced by the friction of two pieces of wood, which created the flame. This was quite a religious ceremony, and was accompanied by singing, dancing and the Beltane games. The Beltane cakes were precursors of Easter cakes, a survival of which is still with us in hot cross buns.

The music of Easter is generally of a more advanced character than that of Christmas. Carols predominate at the Christmas festival, but there are few carols at Easter, where the music is more in keeping with the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ.



Palestrina Was Commissioned to Write Suitable Music.

Easter has probably had greater influence in the development of music than any other period of the year. The Council of Trent assembled at this season in 1562, when the great reformation in church music took place. Composers of this time had introduced profane melodies as the principal theme in the masses, and all kinds of ornamentation of an unsuitable character. The council swept the whole system from the church, and commissioned Palestrina to write suitable music for service. He did this, and has since often been referred to as the saviour of church music.

It was the story of the Resurrection of Christ that inspired Schultz to write the first oratorio on that subject. He wrote "The Passion," according to the four Evangelists, and "The Seven Last Words," and history accords to him the title of "The Father of Oratorio."

What would Handel have done without Easter? "The Messiah" stands out as his greatest effort, and there is no composition, even today, which has as great an influence on the people as this oratorio.

The Resurrection of Christ has inspired more lofty thoughts and aspirations in poets, painters and composers than any other subject, and has produced greater works. After the long, cold winter days we are waiting to welcome the Easter sun, so we may join in greeting as we sing,

"Christ the Lord is risen today, Alleluia."

"Right now there is a whole meal cooking in my oven at home . . . a roast, potatoes, carrots, and a dessert. While I'm downtown, the range turns itself on automatically . . . cooks the entire meal, and does it better than if I had stayed at home fussing with it!

"My electric oven needs no watching. It takes care of itself whether I'm at home or away . . . AND I CAN TRUST IT.

Headache Grouch Throws Rock Into Liquor Store

Janesville--A piece of cement block about 6 by nine inches was hurled through the glass door of the Janesville Liquor store at an early hour of the morning recently either by someone with a terrible headache and a grouch, or someone who wanted to have a headache. Marshall McIver heard the crash of glass and investigated immediately, but found no one near the premises. Apparently no liquor was stolen, although it is believed that someone was licking his lips around the corner, waiting to see whether the crash was heard before he entered the store.

Dust Storm Cuts And Ruins Car Windshield

Fairmont--Almost unbelievable damage was done by dust storms was illustrated last week near Fairmont when the car of Emil Johnson, paper salemen from Minneapolis, was literally peppered with buckshot driven by the wind, the fine sand and grit cut so deeply into his windshied that the non-shatter glass was ruined. The windshield and lenses of the headlights will have to be replaced. An Indian insignia on the front of the car was stripped of all its red war paint, the license plate had its paint cut away and the dust cut the paint on hood, radiator and front fenders so deeply that a new job of painting is in order.

Start Adult Classes

G. G. Denning of Plummer, regional director of adult education under the new government plan, met with a group of local men at the school building Tuesday evening to organize an adult study club or forum. Several courses such as public speaking, etc., are offered free of charge to adults if enough can be interested to make up a class.

The meeting Tuesday night was not very well attended because of inclement weather, but much interest was shown by those present. Mr. Denning has arranged to be here each Tuesday until further notice.

Session Ends Today

The present session of the legislature ends at noon today. All business to be transacted at this session ended at midnight. As is usual, the clock was turned back several times to permit passage of last-minute legislation. The lawmakers meet today not to transact any business, but for formal adjournment.

With funds available at low cost thru the federal housing act, there may be much activity in remodeling, repairing and painting of residence properties in the northwest this year. Very little in way of repairing has been done the past ten years and a large percentage of all buildings show the lack of it. In order to produce more employment the government has made available money for remodeling and repairing at very low rates.

Another steady downpour of rain yesterday afternoon will delay seeding for several days. Many farmers had their equipment ready and were planning to seed during last half of this week. The moisture is not unwelcome, however, as it will serve to give pastures an early start which is equally as important as early seeding in this dairying section.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Stephens and daughter, of Angus motored here Sunday for a visit at the Lee Beebe home and with other relatives and friends.

The Minnesota Conservation Commission is sponsering a new program of winter feeding for game birds. It will furnish free of charge, black amber cane seed to all farmers who will plant it. The cane is to be cut and shocked in the fall and left standing in the fields as food and shelter for game birds until early spring. Farmers will then use the cane as food for stock. Experimental plantings of 20 acres will be made in this county.

He has travelled entire length of the route at different times and picked up only one letter and at other times getting only two or three. Tuesday he delivered over the entire route without a single pickup, the first instance of its kind in his thousands of trips. It is likely the change in mail time, which brings him over the route two hours earlier, may be responsible for lack of pickup.

"Terrorists" Put Mark On Each Fairmont House

Fairmont — Residents of this city had visions of being marked by a gang of terrorists last week, when every house in town was found marked with a number from one to four. Police, investigating a series of five robberies of homes the night before, immediately saw a connection, and citizens began buying new locks for their doors and oiling up their shotguns. But it all turned out to be just a group of soap salesmen, who canvassed the city giving away coupons for soap. There were four young men in the group, and apparently to avoid duplication, each left his number on the house he had visited. Police received dozens of calls about the numbers, but it was not until late in the day that anyone could be found who had seen the salesmen write their number on the house.

Eggs, Cream Scrambled In Automobile Accident

Fosston—Forty dozen eggs and five gallons of cream, rolled together in a ditch when a car overturned near Fosston recently, gave plenty of opportunity for anyone so inclined to add a little salt and baking powder and bake a cake right in the ditch. The accident occured about a mile west of Crookston, when the car in which Mrs. A. R. Behlke and her son were bringing their produce to market slid from the pavement onto a soft shoulder in the road and rolled into the ditch. The farm products were a total loss, but the birds nearby stuffed themselves. Injuries to the occupants of the car were slight, and damage to the car is largely the result of the smashed eggs and spilled cream.

Beethoven, Deaf, Composed

Beethoven composed music after he became deaf. A letter written in 1800, when he was not yet thirty, begs that his deafness be kept "a profound secret." He was completely deaf a few years later, but he continued to write music until November, 1826, five months before his death.

To Use Tent For Furniture Store

Baudette—Business is on the boom in Baudette, and regardless of whether there are buildings enough to go around, trade must go on! Frank Hawley, Warroad merchant, came to Baudette recently to secure a building for a furniture store, and the fact that he couldn't find a building didn't phase him. He has a tent 60x30, with a floor, and he will use that until such time as he can secure a building for a permanent store. Two carloads of furniture have been shipped into Baudette by Hawley, and it looks like the big tent will become one of the town's most enterprising establishments. There may not be any show windows in the new "store", but lift the flap and come in! Our overhead is small and we can sell for less!

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

CANDLES certainly are decorative utilities. There is no light more becoming to individuals. It softens blemishes, and accents beauty. It acts in the same way on things in a room. The mellow rays shimmer on silver when candles light a dining table. And they bring out prismatic lights in glass and lend charm to china. Then apart from their illuminating excellence, the candles themselves can be ornamental. Colors can be caught in them that are wanted to be accented in a color scheme for a room or a table. Or again the color of the candles may decide the color scheme for table-decorations.

One attractive plan of this sort uses satin ribbon the same color as the candles to lay across a table from centerpiece to candlesticks. The ribbon forms one or more bows at the centerpiece and the long ends extend to the candlesticks. One homemaker keeps sets of candles and ribbons to match, pink, blue, gold, silver, orchid, etc. The initial cost is the chief expense, as one set of tall candles generally does for more than one dinner.

To increase the longevity of candles put them in the refrigerator for some hours before lighting. They will burn longer, as the wax is chilled and does not melt readily, but keeps the wicks well oiled. This is not only a thrifty measure, but a sightly one, as the drip from melting candles does not increase their beauty. By the way, remember that three candles should not burn on a table. There may be two, four or any other number, but three is incorrect.

After candles have served their specific purpose, the ends can be put to good use. Tie a piece of thin cloth about a bit of candle and it makes an excellent flatiron polisher and smoother. Rub it over the face of the iron while it is hot, and rub the iron over a piece of old cloth or heavy paper. Then iron with it and note the improvement.

Some persons always save candle ends to throw on open fires before lighting them. The flare of the rapidly burning wax helps to ignite the wood. A bit of candle is just the thing to use to wax thread when sewing. The candle end can be rounded or slightly shaped for the work basket if the wax is pressed into shape after it is slowly warmed, enough to be molded.

A Smart Table Decoration of Colored Candles and Matching Ribbons

CALORIE NEEDS DEPEND ON AGE

About 1,300 a Day Required by Average Person.

By EDITH M. BARBER

WE MUST have a certain number of calories, depending upon our age and occupation, to preserve life. Years ago when nutrition as a science was in its infancy we judged foods almost entirely by the calorie or fuel value. We gave them another score for the protein, that is to say muscle building content. We did not care particularly about the minerals, and we did not even know that the vitamins existed. Now we score our foods on all these counts. There is less talk about the calorie value, but its importance still remains.

The average person needs twelve to thirteen hundred calories a day just to exist. This is known as the basal requirement and to this must be added more for all the exercise we take. A man doing heavy labor may use up 4,000 to 6,000 calories. Persons who lead sedentary lives, however, may get along on 2,000 to 3,000 calories a day.

If we overeat, the foods which are not used up will be deposited as fat in our tissues. It is true that concentrated foods of high calories value such as fats, sugars and starches provide a comparatively large number of calories and for this reason the sedentary person avoids an oversupply of these so-called heating foods. The person who uses this term, however, I find usually refers to cooked cereals and to meat, which is actually first of all for tissue building. The term "heating foods" is old-fashioned and usually dates us.

Codfish Cakes.

1 cup salt codfish
2½ cups mashed potatoes
2 tablespoons milk
½ tablespoon butter
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 egg
3 teaspoons parsley

Pick the codfish into bits and let simmer 30 minutes. Prepare the potato as usual, add the fish, egg, parsley, butter and pepper and the milk if more moisture is needed. Shape into flat cakes or into balls, egg and crumb, and fry in deep fat at 360 degrees Fahrenheit until golden brown.

Frozen Macaroon Cream Cake.

Line a refrigerator tray with whipped cream. Arrange macaroons in rows, spread a layer of whipped cream and arrange more rows of macaroons. Cover with whipped cream and freeze three to four hours.

Cornstarch Pudding.

4½ tablespoons cornstarch
3¼ cups milk
2 eggs
Salt
⅓ cup sugar
1 teaspoon vanilla

Scald three cups of milk. Mix the cornstarch with the remainder of the cold milk and add to the scalded milk in the double boiler, stirring constantly until the mixture thickens. Cover and cook for at least 20 minutes. Beat the eggs and add the sugar and salt. Pour some of the hot mixture slowly over the mixed egg and sugar, stirring constantly, add to the mixture in the double boiler. Cook three minutes, add vanilla and pour into molds to cool. To make a light, fluffy pudding the yolks and the whites may be beaten separately, the yolks mixed with the sugar and the whites folded in after the pudding has been removed from the fire. For chocolate pudding mix four tablespoons of cocoa with the cornstarch, or scald one and one-half squares of chocolate with the milk and beat well. The eggs may be omitted.

Grandmother's Shoofly Pie.

Line a pie pan with pastry rolled a little thicker than usual. Sprinkle plentifully with brown sugar, dot with butter and bake in a hot oven, 450 degrees, about 15 minutes. Cinnamon may be added.

Cream Filling.

¾ cup sugar
½ cup flour
⅛ teaspoon salt
2 eggs
2 cups scalded milk
1 teaspoon vanilla, or ½ teaspoon lemon extract
½ cup whipped cream

Mix the dry ingredients, add the eggs slightly beaten and pour on gradually the scalded milk. Cook 15 minutes in a double boiler, stirring constantly until thickened, afterward stirring occasionally. Flavor and cool in refrigerator. Before filling cream puff shells fold in the half cup of whipped cream.

Buttoned Upholstery

Buttoned upholstery is one of the old styles beginning to enjoy a revival. It is a type requiring expert craftsmanship. It may be done on straight, curved or angular surfaces and on seats as well as backs and arms of chairs. The buttoning is done in different ways, sometimes merely fastening the upholstery textile to the well wadded lining which covers a frame which may or may not be fitted with springs, the indentations of the buttons being very slight. Again the buttoning holds folds of carefully laid pleats firmly and also carefully spaced so that the fullness smooths out between buttons. Or again the buttons are deeply inset owing to the depth of the upholstery interlining. It is undoubtedly from the buttoned upholstery of antique furniture that the buttoned quilt has its inspiration.

Painted Panelling

Contrary to the general impression, panelled pine rooms were seldom seen in Colonial days in their natural finish. Our Pilgrim forefathers thought the wood too knotty to be merely varnished or waved and preferred to give it two or three coats of paint. This gave an even surface to show off the delicate carved moulding and other ornamentation. Dark blue, olive green and brown were favorite colors until the latter part of the Eighteenth century, when light hues became the fashion.

FIRE INSURANCE

Paying fire insurance premiums always seems like giving away money. You get no return until you have a fire. Then the amount you have paid seems small in comparison with what you receive. For your peace of mind and future security, carry adequate insurance in a reliable company. A policy in the old reliable Continental Insurance Company gives you the protection you should have. Ask for particulars and cost.

How Vines Grow

According to the Department of Agriculture location in reference to the equator does not affect the direction in which vines grow, although there is a widespread notion that this is so. Some species have a natural tendency to twist clockwise about the support; others in a counter-clockwise manner. Natural conditions decide the direction in some instances, but a few even reverse the original direction for little or no reason.

Dust Storms Drive Ducks, Geese East

Hills—Big flocks of geese traveling northward are reported in several sections of the state, the dust storms in the southwest apparently driving those which would ordinarily have gone north through the Dakotas and Montana through this section. A flock estimated at from two to three thousand birds settled in fields northeast of Hills. On the fields where the grain had been seeded but not covered over, many farmers are reporting the loss of all their seed, which will necessitate another seeding. If the birds fly back down through Minnesota the way they are coming up, the hunting will be a sportsmen's paradise this fall.

TIPS ON MAKING TENDER OMELET

Expert Reveals Some Tricks Worth Remembering.

By EDITH M. BARBER

CAN you make a good omelet? That is to say a tender, well-flavored omelet that deserves its name? It is really easy to make but you must know a few tricks of the trade. I shall never forget the first one that I made which finally came to the table as scrambled eggs as I should never have dared to undergo the hoots of my family which would have resulted if I had called that concoction an omelet.

I used to prefer what is known as the French omelet as far as flavor was concerned, although the fluffy omelet has a much better appearance. Now, however, I have become an addict to one which looks as well as the fluffy and which tastes better than either the fluffy or the French. When I was in Normandy a year or so ago I watched again and again the making of a world famed omelet at the Maison Poulard at Mont Saint Michel. Travelers go to Mont Saint Michel to see the famous abbey, that huge pile rising out of the sea, and to eat the omelet which Mme. Poulard created and which is cook in a long handled frying pan over the coals in a fireplace of the lobby. Of course they tell you that you cannot duplicate this omelet except over the coals. After much experimentation, however, I have been able to reproduce it quite successfully over my modern gas range.

Believe it or not this omelet contains nothing but eggs. No water, no salt, no pepper. The eggs are broken into a bowl and beaten together until very foamy. In the frying pan a large amount of butter, one-fourth cup to six eggs, is heated. The eggs are poured into it and stirred once. The pan is then shaken over a low fire. As the eggs set they should be lifted to let some of the liquid underneath. There should, however, be some foam which is not really cooked. The omelet should not be very brown when folded. French omelets are never browned. The large amount of butter gives enough salt to suit the taste of most persons, but if you like you may add more at the table. I think that when you try the recipe you will agree with me that its tenderness, its flavor and its appearance make its reputation deserved.

Omelet a la Poulard.

9 eggs
½ cup butter

Beat the eggs until light and foamy. Melt the butter over a low heat, add the eggs and stir once. Continue cooking over a low heat, pushing back the edges and letting the liquid run into the bottom of the pan. There will be some foam remaining on the top. Increase the heat and shake the pan until the omelet loosens. Fold omelet in two with a spatula and slip onto a hot platter.

French Omelet.

6 eggs
6 tablespoons water
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon butter

Beat the eggs slightly, add the water and seasonings. Melt the butter in hot frying pan and pour in the mixture. Cook gently over low fire until firm, then with a knife lift the edges and let the liquid run underneath. Brown on the bottom, fold and roll onto a hot platter. Garnish with parsley or slices of coked bacon.

Fluffy Omelet.

2 tablespoons granulated tapioca
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
¾ cup milk, scalded
1 tablespoon butter
4 egg yolks, beaten until thick and lemon color
4 egg whites, stiffly beaten.

Add tapioca, salt and pepper to milk and cook in double boiler ten minutes, stirring frequently. Add butter. Combine with egg yolks, stirring constantly. Fold in egg whites. Pour into hot buttered frying pan. Cook over low flame 15 minutes. Dry top of omelet in slow oven (275 degrees Fahrenheit), five minutes. Cut across at right angles to handle of pan, being careful not to cut all the way through. Fold carefully from handle to opposite side.

A guest room designed by Lurelle Guild skillfully conceals sewing room accessories when they are not neded. Beneath a bed which is built into the alcove of one wall, are three deep drawers which allow for storage of scraps, shears, tapes, spools and the sewing work of the moment. The sewing machine, placed beneath a window so ample light may be obtained, becomes a dressing table with a decorative flounce when a guest has come to visit. A comfortable chair, a chest of drawers, a full length mirror and colorfully painted walls complete the room.

St. Peter—Mrs. E. M. Nelson of this community was announced as the winner of a $10,000 prize in a national baby naming contest conducted by General Mills, Inc. Mrs. Nelson submitted the name "Norita" a derivative of the English name, "Norry," meaning "foster child," and the gipsy name, "Noritza" which means to "nourish". The check was presented to Mrs. Nelson at the Twin City office of the Washburn Crosby Company.

Windom—The Cottonwood County Farm Bureau Association has adopted a resolution demanding that persons on relief rolls, able to do manual labor, be removed from the relief lists if they refuse to go to work on farms at the prevailing wage scale. The association declared there have been several instances where men on relief have refused jobs on farms at $25 to $30 a month, stating they would rather remain on the relief rolls than work for that wage.

Approximately 1,400 men now are at work on river projects in the St. Paul district which extends south to the mouth of the Wisconsin river, just below Prairie du Chien, Wis.

Minneapolis—All children in Minneapolis up to seven years of age were ordered quarantined to their homes for a period of three weeks by Dr. F. E. Harrington, public health commissioner. The order was issued to combat the spread of scarlet fever. Children who are seven years old are not included. Dr. Harrington estimated 20,000 children are affected by the order, which requires all the children affected to remain in their own homes or on their own premises until May 6.

St. Paul—The Republican-controlled state executive council stripped the Farmer-Labor party of control of the administration of soldiers' relief funds in Minnesota. At a meeting in the governor's office, the council removed the supervision of the $1,250,000 fund recently granted by the legislature from the board of control and vested it in a new agency, the executive council war veterans relief agency. This agency will begin operations shortly under the direction of George B. Sjosellus of Duluth and will replace the soldiers' welfare fund division.

Right of "Eminent Domain"

The "right of eminent domain" means that a state has first right to land for purposes necessary to the common welfare, a right exercised in such instances as when land is taken for a public road right-of-way, under conditions putting the interest of all the people above the interest of one landowner. The state cannot take, however, without paying. The right may also be extended to utilities and other private interests deemed to serve the common good.

Varieties of Cactus

There are a large number of varieties of cactus, some of which grow in the hot, dry regions near the Mexican border, in southwestern Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and southern California. They may grow singly or in patches. A few varieties grow as far north as Massachusetts and Minnesota; others are found in Utah, Colorado, Florida, etc. Several have become popular house plants.

Growth of Baby Crabs

A baby crab is less like an adult crab in structure than a tadpole is like a frog when it is born, and it does not achieve the familiar crab pattern until it is about a month old. From that time on for a period of six months or more it grows so rapidly that it has to discard its outgrown shell about twice a month. At the end of that time it will have become a fair sized crab.

Note From 1890 Cornerstone Foretells Ocean Air Travel

Little Falls—Workmen opening the cornerstone in the city hall of Little Falls recently found a note from the previous generation, written in 1890, predicting that some day man would cross the ocean by air, and a new cornerstone laid in the remodeled building will contain a message to the future generation, signed by the city council. The old note, encased in a bottle and written 45 years ago, when the structure was first built, will be returned to a resting place in the new cornerstone along with the message of the present. The council briefly reviewed conditions in the world as they now stand, including the depression, various governmental agencies and aids, old age pension talk, war rumors, and closed with greetings to the future generations from the 1935 city administration.

DIAMOND CHARLIE had followed the crowd into Chinatown to get a look at the five dead Chinese lying on the cobblestones at the corner of Pell and Mott.

The police were loading the bodies into the patrol wagon. Charlie stood at the curb looking at the drying rust colored spots on the gray cobblestones. That last Chinaman—more Amercanized than the rest—no pigtail, eyes glazed, lips half open. The rich merchant, Li Sung Moy.

Charlie watched the second patrol wagon back up to a three-story frame house at the corner of Doyers street. In the last room they found Li Sung Moy's white wife.

In the flickering light her face looked pale and unreal. Her hair was heavy, golden, coiled softly about her head, banded by a tricorne jeweled headdress. Festoons of pink and yellow flowers fell to her shoulders; pearls twined with jade ornaments hung in a fringe over her wide, blank, blue eyes. She smiled at the police as they questioned her. They wrapped gray blankets about the fragile body, and carried her down to daylight from the room where she had lived for sixteen years.

Charlie edged his way to the curb to get a look at her. Her eyes blinked like an owl's in the sunlight. She hid them with her long embroidered sleeve. He heard her moaning as they lifted her to the long seat of the wagon. The gong sounded, the crowd and pigeons scattered together. Charlie rolled a cigarette with one hand, staring after the wagon with a scowl. Then he lit it with a cupped match, pulled his low-crowned derby lower over his eyes and started for Bellevue hospital.

He stopped in a saloon for a drink and looked at himself in the mirror over the bar. She'd never know him —not after sixteen years. Not much left of the old debonair Charlie—Diamond Charlie—circus con man. Only the horseshoe scarfpin of small chip diamonds in the red satin four in hand. His cuff links held two more pretty good stones, and the snake ring on his little finger had a big white diamond, the best he had left of the old display.

Funny that he had found Blanche this way. Hunting for her sixteen years, happening to follow a patrol wagon to watch them rip open the old hop joints, and there she was. He had only just got in town, unloading elephants up at Mott Haven since midnight, trekking with them all the way down Third avenue. Tender of elephants he was now. He grinned wondering what Blanche would think of that.

He had to wait at the hospital even after he had signed a card naming himself her best friend. The smell of the river swept over the old gray quadrangle. Made him think of Bridgeport and the docks—of Blanche, eighteen, just from Australia booked to do a big spectacular act on the rings. Little wisp of a girl. They had married and kept with the show for five years, until she missed one night in Buffalo. Dope to stop the pain, hoping to keep on with the act. Something wrong with her back. Left behind in New York to be treated while he went on to the coast. No answer finally to his letters, even money orders returned and at last, word from the police that she was missing from the rooming house on Twenty-ninth East where he had left her.

He glanced at his watch and started for the addict ward. Blanche lay back on her pillow white as the jade amulet on the red silk cord about her throat. Charlie waited while the doctor examined her; the purple shadowed long nails, her dreaming eyes beneath closed lids.

When he left, the nurse set a fourfold screen around the bed. Any time at all, she told Charlie. On the way to the hospital in the patrol wagon she had taken an overdose of something hidden in her long satin sleeve.

The elephants up in Madison Square garden missed some of their usual ministrations while Charlie sat hours beside the white bed. He held one of her hands in his. Her other one clung to the jade amulet on the silk cord. He talked to her, trying to penetrate that last deep sleep. She had always wanted him around when she did her act, he thought. He used to wait for her while she took her final bows to wrap her blue velvet cape about her. Blue velvet with swansdown edging. Blue eyes, blond curly hair. Pale blue silk tights, blue satin blouse—little bit of a thing she was. He hummed the old entrance music to himself half consciously—the "Skater's Waltz."

He thought he felt her fingers close tighter over his hands. "Listen, Kiddie," he said eagerly as her eyelids lifted. "You look great. Your act was fine, honey. You're all right, kid—see, it's Charlie telling you—Charlie. I'm right here, kid—"

She gazed up at him as she made her entrance into the Big Show.

On his way out under the red brick ivy-covered archway, Charlie rolled a cigarette musingly. Mrs. Blanche McCarter, beloved wife of Charles M. McCarter. In the "Clipper and Billboard." Some of the old-timers would see it. He'd take a day off and run up to Bridgeport to bury her, their last trouping together. And violets. Plenty. She liked them. He turned his coat collar up against the freshening east wind and started briskly over toward Third avenue to hunt a good pawnshop for diamonds.

St. Hilaire Wins

The St. Hilaire high school baseball team scored a victory in its first game of the season against Goodridge high school on Tuesday by the score of 26 to 18.

The game was played under weather conditions more suitable for football than baseball. This undoubtedly was the cause for the loose fielding by both teams. St. Hilaire made a total of 15 hits while Goodridge connected for 10.

Next Tuesday the local high school will play the Thief River Falls high school team on the local grounds. And on the 14th of May they will play Goodridge here. On May 10th the Crookston high school team will be played there.

People in large areas in South and North Dakota where drought conditions prevailed last season, are rejoicing following heavy rains over that section during the past week. Omnibus Tax Bill

Pennington County taxpayers lost a $65,445 reduction in their general property taxes when the omnibus tax replacement bill failed to become law last week. This amount would, of course, have been made up by the sales tax feature proposed. In most instances, owners of small property would have paid as much or more under the sales tax as they would have saved by elimination of the state levy on real estate. The only good feature of the sales tax plan is that it would have spread the tax among all classes instead of having real estate carry the entire load.

The Barber's Pole

The red-and-white striped barber's pole dates back to the time when a barber not only cut hair and shaved his customers but also practiced minor surgery such as blood letting and wound dressing, says Pathfinder Magazine. It was not until 1745 that the barber surgeons (as they were called) were prohibited from practicing surgery in England. It was abolished in France about the time of the revolution and in Germany around 1809. In the original symbol, a brass basin hung from the striped pole. It is generally agreed that the stripes represented bandages; the basin, the vessel for receiving the blood. Only the pole is used in America.

Tigers

There is no species of tiger native to the western hemisphere. There are two large American cats—the puma, Felis concolor, inhabiting North America from the United States southward, which is fawn color, unstriped and unspotted, and the jaguar, Felis onca, larger than the puma, which inhabits America from Central America southward to the southern limit of tropical South America, and which is a tawny yellow color marked by black spots similar to those of the lizard of the Old world.

Blushing Bird Bride

The paradise tern has been termed the blushing bride of the bird family, because when a female of this species accepts the advances of a suitor the white feathers on her breast change to a brilliant rose color. After mating and the bride becomes absorbed in raising a family, the gay bridal attire becomes more and more subdued until finally no trace of the lovely rose coloring remains.

Syria

Syria is a former province of the old Turkish empire, which with Bulgaria, joined the central powers of Germany and Austria-Hungary. Syria was made an independent state by the Treaty of Sevres, August 10, 1920, and administered under the mandate given to France by the supreme council of the allied powers. The mandate went into force on September 29, 1923.

Most Intelligent Animals

Ohio Fire Lands

The Fire Lands, a tract of 500,000 acres in Erie and Huron counties, Ohio, had nothing to do with fires. This land was set aside by the national government for the citizens in Connecticut whose towns were destroyed during the Revolution.

Ebony

Ebony is the heartwood of several different tropical African and Asiatic trees. The best ebony is a deep black, although other varieties vary in color through several shades of brown. The term, ebony, is also applied to the wood of trees other than true ebonies, including the green ebony of the West Indies and the bastard ebony of Brazil.

Fitch of Marten Species

Gottlieb's "Fur Truths" states the fitch, sometimes called polecat, is of the marten species. It has yellow under-wool with very fine and often dark top hair. The largest skins are from Holland, Denmark and Germany. The Russian fitch are small but more silky, and lighter in color.

Finicky About Car Colors

Black automobiles cannot be sold to superstitious natives of India because the color is considered unlucky. Use of red is forbidden, even as a trimming on the body and wheels, in some countries because of efforts to suppress Bolshevism.

THE GRACE OF GOD

By LUCIE A. O'BRIEN

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

"TESSIE, where are you going?" Mrs. Delaney peremptorily asked her daughter from the pantry doorway.

The girl clutched the door-knob to steady her trembling fingers. "Oh—just out."

"Where?" Mrs. Delaney's voice was just a trifle shrill.

"Oh, ma, I'm over twelve," replied her daughter.

"Yes," rejoined her mother, "you're twenty-one. That's why you ought to show some sense. And let me tell you once and for all, young lady, you've got to stop meeting this sneaky fellow . . ."

"Well, I won't," burst out the girl, passionately. "I'm old enough to take care of myself. And . . ."

"The hospitals and morgues are full of girls who thought the same thing," interrupted her mother.

"And Fremont Sawyer is a gentleman," continued the girl.

"Then preserve me from a gentleman who won't come to a girl's house and lets her out of an automobile on the corner."

Teresa flushed a shamed red. The shaft had struck.

"What of it?" She braved the issue. "I suppose if his name was Sullivan or O'Toole or McCarthy he'd be wonderful."

Previous experience should have taught Teresa that she could not outscore her mother in crushing rejoinders.

"My best friends are Mrs. McGregor and Mrs. Uditsky next door," said the mother, heavily; "and two finer women don't live. But, I tell you this, Tessie, oil and water don't scratch, but they don't mix, either. And when it comes to marriage—"

"Who said anything about marriage?" queried Teresa with forced jauntiness.

"Well then, what's he about?" thundered Mrs. Delaney. And then the pent-up anxiety of the past months burst forth in a tempestuous torrent of scathing, bitter words.

"All right," cried Teresa, angrily. "I can look out for myself. I work . . ."

"Yes, you'll go far," sniffed Mrs. Delaney.

Every bit of Teresa's fair office salary went for clothes and gewgaws to adorn her pretty self.

"Now, see here, Tessie—"

"Tessie! Can't you call me Teresa?"

"Very well, Teresa. But you don't stir out of this house to meet that road snake. There are plenty of amusements right here in town without needing to cross over to reach God-forsaken places—and I mean it. I'm going to settle this affair, once and for all."

"I don't wonder that girls leave home!" raged Teresa.

"Aw, say, Tess, cut the rough stuff," interjected a husky, boyish voice.

A coppery-haired lad of fifteen sauntered into the room.

Passing his mother, he put a grimy hand on her shoulder and said, "Want to go see Wallace Beery, ma? You know he always hands you a laugh."

His boyish subterfuge was so transparent that Mrs. Delaney suddenly bowed her head. Strangled sobs escaped her.

Teresa and Charlie stood aghast.

Mrs. Delaney was not a person given to surface emotions.

Teresa's heart pounded painfully.

She wanted to fling her young arms around her mother and say, "Ma, don't cry like that. Honestly, I love you."

Unfortunately, members of families are shy at expressing affection for one another.

Yet the tense situation might have cleared somehow had not Charlie dispelled that golden chance by his ensuing indignant words:

"You certainly are a flat tire—and so's that ham-and-egger you travel with."

Teresa wrenched the door open.

"Maybe you'll be glad if we travel so far that I'll never come back."

Mrs. Delaney rose, her usual poise fully restored.

"Go, Teresa," she directed, gravely; "and may the grace of God be with you."

Teresa, awe-stricken and shivering, ran down the gloomy stairway.

Once on the sidewalk, in the golden sunshine, her rankling thoughts cleared magically.

She looked at her enameled wristwatch—her mother's gift to her on her twenty-first birthday. Mrs. Delaney wore Teresa's discarded one.

Teresa hesitated. . . . But a vision of a tall young man floated before her.

A young man of mysterious eyes, mysterious charms, mysterious enterprises, who, by his own account, could have any girl in town.

Teresa moved forward briskly.

She had intended walking to the ferry-landing this gorgeous day. But the wordy encounter with her mother having delayed her, she was obliged to board a trolley and transfer to a ferry tram. She reached the slip just as the ferry boat was edging away.

She saw the widening expanse of bottle-green water churning soapily in the wake of the heavily-laden ferry boat, "Kismet."

Her eyes, smarting with scalding tears, she retraced her steps, her heart heavy.

She knew Fremy well enough to realize that he would not wait for the next boat—an hour hence.

She remembered his oft-quoted declaration that there were too many lively fish in any old pond to await the coming of a slow one.

The gold and blue day suddenly became drab and dull.

Infatuation and inexperience blinded Teresa to the fact that Fremy Sawyer's every action indicated the cheap poseur, eager for praise and admiration. She had, so far, refused to let Fremy park along dark roadsides but she sensed that she could not put him off much longer.

Disappointment, anger, and the underlying gnawing remembrance of her mother's hurt, all combined to make her head whirl.

Distraught, she stepped back.

She was conscious of shouts, of grinding noises.

She felt a violent impact.

There followed the quiet of the tomb.

• • • • • • •

Teresa raised her heavy eyelids.

Through a haze she saw her mother and Charlie.

A white-robed person eased her pillow.

Teresa was conscious of a sickingly sweetish odor. A leaden weight held her down.

"Ma," she whispered, "what happened?"

"Just a minor accident, my dear," crisply answered the efficient, uniformed personage at her bedside.

"You were struck a glancing blow by a machine. Nothing serious."

She frowned warningly at the visitors as she bustled out of the sickroom.

Charlie gaped after her retreating figure.

Struck and thrown by a truck, his sister had miraculously escaped death: but the fractures and contusions she had sustained would confine her to the hospital for some time.

"Twas the grace of God," said Mrs. Delaney, softly.

Charlie grinned. That was ma. "It might have been worse, etc., etc."

"Ma—" Teresa struggled with the stubborn words—"I'm sorry—I didn't mean—"

"When you get out of the hospital, we'll most likely get a car," replied her mother, her eyes clear, although there was a stinging in her nose and a prickling in her throat.

"Ma, I meant to go. I missed the ferry."

"'Twas the grace of God!" intoned Mrs. Delaney.

The light of understanding flooded Charlie's young mind. He suddenly remembered his mother's parting words to Teresa. And the grace of God sure had been with his sister.

"Tess, what do you think? A state cop spotted Fremy Sawyer going sixty—with his arm around a girl." Mrs. Delaney tried vainly to catch her son's eye, to warn him into silence. "The cop chased him—Fremy's car skidded around a curve and went plumb over the bank down to the shore."

Teresa closed her eyes to shut out the frightful picture of the speeding machine breaking through the guard rail and hurtling down the steep embankment to the sea-swept beach below.

"'Twas the grace of God," droned Mrs. Delaney as she adjusted the white coverlet.

And in their young hearts, Teresa and Charlie thankfully voiced: "Amen."

Mormon Cricket Promises Another Bothersome Year

One of the pests of the early settlers, particularly the settlers of the northern Rocky mountain region, has come back once more to add to the many trials of the wheat and other cereal growers, says the Washington Star. This particular pest, the Mormon cricket, was so named because of the fact that the Mormon settlers were the first to really suffer from their voracious appetites for grain.

Singularly, the crickets originate in the mountain areas, particularly on uncultivated land where the eggs are laid and the young hatch by the myriad.

The campaign of eradication begun recently is based largely on a drive to kill the young when they first hatch and before they have an opportunity to migrate to the wheat fields.

The most effective way to prevent damage by the Morman cricket, Dr. P. N. Annand of the bureau of ethnology explains, is to kill the bands of young crickets in the wild lands where they hatch out by dusting them with a mixture of powdered calcium arsenite and hydrated lime. If their migration is not stopped in time, he continues, the only way to save cultivated crops in their path will be to erect barriers of corrugated tin roofing or galvanized sheet iron. These barriers, although effective in halting the advance and in killing individual insects, are expensive and difficult to handle.

Degree of Murder

In Pennsylvania and in New Jersey there are two degrees of murder. Both degrees are distinguished from manslaughter by reason of the presence of a mental state called malice. In first degree murder this malice is relatively more serious than in second degree in that there is a specific intent to kill or the death is caused while some heinous offense like robbery, rape, arson, kidnaping, or burglary is being committed. In both states, first degree murder is punishable by death or life imprisonment, in the discretion of the jury. For second degree murder the maximum sentence in Pennsylvania is 20 years; in New Jersey, 30 years.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Conserve Moisture by Plowing Early

Average Rainfall Not Enough to Fill Soil to Its Field Capacity.

By Richard Bradfield, Agronomist at Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

Plow as early as possible, to conserve moisture. It is high time for us to be thinking rather seriously about the drouth problem, and ways to reduce its ravages. Rough plowed land, if there is no danger of erosion, is an ideal condition for absorbing the heavy rains that are hoped for early in the year.

Every foot of soil of average texture is capable of storing and holding against the pull of gravity the equivalent of about three inches of rainfall. In a soil eight feet deep, this is a storage capacity of 24 inches.

If every drop of normal rainfall from now until April 1 runs into the soil, the total is 9 to 10 inches, which is only half enough to fill our soil to its field capacity.

From 300 to 1,000 pounds of water are required by growing plants to produce one pound of dry matter. A single corn stalk may absorb and transpire through its leaves as much as 55 gallons of water during its development. This amounts for a full stand of corn to over 20 inches of water, an amount in excess of the average rainfall during the corn-growing season. The difference must be drawn from the reserve of moisture accumulated in the soil in winter and early spring months.

Sweet Clover Is Put to Front as Soil Crop

Once considered a weed sweet clover has had to bear the brunt of protecting fertility levels on thousands of acres of farm lands during the depression period when farmers have not had the cash for mineral fertilizers, it is pointed out by L. B. Miller, associate in soil experiment fields at the College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.

Until 1929 the use both of commercial fertilizers and of sweet clover was on the increase. That year some 38,864 tons of factory-processed fertilizer were applied in the state. At the same time the sweet clover acreage amounted to something less than 800,000 acres.

However, applications of commercial fertilizers have declined to a fourth of the peak year, while sweet clover acreages have continued to increase. By 1931 a total of 856,000 acres in Illinois were devoted to growing sweet clover, largely for soil improvement purposes. With the coming of the government's adjustment programs in 1933 and 1934, wherein AAA contracted land could be sown to legumes and at the same time get benefit payments. sweet clover acreage is believed to have reached the million mark.

Inoculated sweet clover provides an efficient fertilizer factory on any farm having sweet soil and a fair supply of the major mineral plant foods. Besides its value as a green manure, the legume is well known for its ability to provide abundant pasture, or it may be harvested for seed. In years when cash expenditures for factory fertilizer were impractical, Illinois farmers who had limed land were quick to take advantage of the triple value of sweet clover, and particularly for general soil improvement.

Tasting Milk

During winter farmers often find that milk, fresh from the cow, is bitter and many of them have attributed this to alfalfa hay or other feed together with the scarcity of green grass. While it is true some feeds such as weeds, some kinds of leaves and other herbage can cause bitter milk, and that sometimes a cow herself may be off condition and give bitter or salty milk, the usual cause of bitter milk during winter is the cool temperature which retards the development of certain bacteria. The bacteria which cause the bitter taste grow when temperatures are low while the bacteria which make milk sweet grow at warmer temperatures. Thus in cold weather one might properly say that the bacteria content is out of balance, causing bitter milk, and the cow's diet has nothing to do with it.—Missouri Farmer.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

SOAP dishes may save or waste the soap. So it is for the homemaker to select those which lessen her budget rather than increase it. The kind of soap dishes to avoid are those which tend to keep the soap wet. The kinds to choose are those which permit the soap to drain off extra moisture and allow air currents to circulate about it and thus aid in the drying out of the cake. It would be supposed that all soap dishes would have these features, but such is not the case.

The bottom of a soap dish should be perforated, or else have a perforated soap rest in it raised sufficiently above the bottom of the dish to allow some water to collect in it without touching the soap. These features permit soap to drain after using and to dry quickly from air circulating about the cake. Woven wire or metal slat soap containers are well liked for bathtubs and sinks. The soap drains into tub or sink and dries well, since plenty of air can get to the cake. Slat containers are not so suitable as perforated or woven wire ones. When a cake of soap gets thin it will slip between the slats, which is annoying, and wasteful also, if it falls into water.

An Excellent Kind.

The best kind of a soap dish is one with a well-raised removable tray. The tray can be taken out and washed in hot water to open clogged holes, and then dried. The dish can be overturned, emptied, washed and dried, and when parts are combined again the dish is like new. Or if the dish is fastened to the wall it can be wiped out, until clean, and then dried before the cleaned tray is restored to its proper place. With such a soap dish and given such care, soap will be kept in good condition without waste.

There is another style of soap dish popular some years ago in which the perforated tray is made high above the bottom of the dish and yet part of the dish itself. In one side, situated well above the bottom of the soap dish there is a good-size opening. The water which collects under the perforated portion never can come high enough to touch the cake of soap. The dish is emptied by pouring the water out through the opening. It is cleaned by running hot water through the perforations to free them from collected softened soap and to flush the under portion of the dish.

A saucer substituted for a soap dish is poor economy. It is impossible to keep the bottom of the saucer free from water and this softens the soap and wastes it. A soap dish with slightly raised bars across the bottom is little better as the soap is not sufficiently elevated to be kept dry.

Seeing Strange Things.

It is amazing the way temporary arrangements, and emergency measures, become settled into permanency in a home. Something suddenly requires immediate adjustment, and it is temporarily fixed with no intention of its remaining as it then is. But days and weeks, months, and sometimes years, pass and the emergency measure still continues its inefficient cure.

The homemaker should occasionally consider herself an outsider, and look at the rooms and their arrangement and peculiarities, and also her wardrobe and its emergency mending, as if her eye was not familiar with them. There will be many things she can fix permanently without delay. What must wait for future attention should be jotted down and attended to at the first possible time. In numerous instances she will realize it is not the cost nor the bother it would mean to have the articles fixed. It is purely and simply because of inattention and the habit of not noticing strange things because they have become the accustomed ones.

The Unwanted Article

What to do with the things we don't want is one of the problems of every one whether man or woman, but more especially of the homemaker. It is she who has not only her personal effects to dispose of but the things which accumulate about the house after their family usefulness is over. Frequently these things are comparatively good, but have been succeeded by something more up to date, as for instance, when a regulation coffee pot has been discarded for a percolator or other type of coffee-making utensil. Or when a common table for the kitchen has given place to one with a porcelain top. Somewhere there is just the right place for such things which have been replaced, just as there are the right persons to make use of garments, shoes, etc., no longer wanted by their owners.

POULTRY

CHICKS NEED ROOM, GOOD, CLEAN FEED

Simple Flat Trough Provides Ample Space

By Cora E. Cook, Extension Poultry Specialist, University Farm, St. Paul.—WNU Service.

Every one will agree that a good ration is essential to raising good chicks, but not every one recognizes the important part feeders play in raising these good chicks efficiently and economically.

Enough feeder space should be provided so that all chicks can eat at one time. Lack of space causes slow and uneven growth and, frequently, troubles with cannibalism, for an idle chick gets into mischief. A four-foot feeder, feeding from both sides, will take care of 100 chicks up to about three weeks. Then more space must be provided. It takes two feeders for 100 chicks during most of the growing period.

Feeders that get filled with litter and filth discourage eating. Set feeders up on stands and clean out any litter that does accumulate.

Feeders that are too expensive discourage providing as many as are needed. A simple flat trough made of lath, a four-inch board and a revolving reel lengthwise of the feeder to keep chicks out of the feed, are easy to make and entirely satisfactory.

As chicks grow the feeders can be raised higher from the floor and thus use floor space to better advantage.

Floors can be kept much cleaner and chicks protected against disease if feeders are placed on shallow platforms, covered with three-quarter-inch mesh hardware cloth. These should be just big enough for the feeder and to collect the droppings and waste feed and water.

Pullets Are Healthier; Tuberculosis Eliminated

"Twenty-five years ago avian tuberculosis was probably just as prevalent in the East as in the Middle West. Now the East is comparatively free from this type, undoubtedly due to the general practice of keeping pullets only," says H. R. Smith, live stock commissioner, Chicago. "Where importance is given to poultry raising as a major industry economy in egg production is essential. Pullets produce more eggs than older hens. If Middle Western flock owners would follow the Eastern practice in farm flocks, tuberculosis could be eliminated."

Avian tuberculosis, in addition to causing heavy losses to the poultry industry, causes heavy mortality in swine. Since bovine tuberculosis is being brought under control, a higher percentage of infected hogs are found to carry the avian type of disease.

Vigor Should Come First

In all animal husbandry, vigor must come first—must be considered before color, relationship, type or anything else; for if vigor is the breeder is not present one is headed for disaster. This mysterious element, cites a writer in the Missouri Farmer, which is something akin to the "it" in movie stars, can only be detected by sight, can only be gauged by the judgment of the breeder. It is gauged by the brightness of eye and the alertness of the bird or animal. Heavy layers have it, else they would not be so prolific. A famous breeder of chickens once said that he was not afraid of lack of vigor in a 300-egg hen and would not hesitate to inbreed such a producer.

Color Variety in Poultry

The prospective poultry breeder, in casting about for a breed or variety with which to specialize, is favored with a wide diversity of types and colors. The original color pigments in the plumage of fowls was red and black, according to authorities, but the possible number of color variations is practically unlimited. Not only are there different colors such as brown, buff, blue, red and black, but various combinations of these. The colors noted are due to the presence of pigment or coloring matter in the shaft of the feather. The absence of any color pigment produces a white feather.—Los Angeles Times.

Ohio's Topography

The most peculiar feature of Ohio's topography is a low, flat ridge called a watershed, which winds across the state from the middle of the western boundary to its northeast section. On a farm, seven miles west of Mansfield, upon the actual divide at an elevation of 1,265 feet, stands a barn from whose eaves the rainfalls flow from one side into the Lake Erie basin and from the other into the Ohio river basin.

Desert Plants

As a general thing the plants to be found in desert regions have short, stunted stems and very small leaves or none at all, these being largely replaced with spines. But the root development of such plants presents a marked contrast to the growth appearing above ground. True desert plant roots are extremely long and branch out widely in every direction.

On Postage Stamps

On animals portrayed by various countries on their postage stamps, the eagle and the lion predominate. However, birds come in for their share of honor—the cockatoo has his place on the stamps of Australia—the parrot on those of Guatemala—the dove on those of Japan—and the black swan on the stamps of West Australia.

Old Valentine Custom

One of the oldest of customs connected with Valentine's day was the placing of the names of young men and women in a box, from which they were drawn on St. Valentine's eve. Those whose names were drawn together had to exchange presents and be "each other's valentines" for the ensuing year.

Snake-Eating Cobra

The food of the hamadryad, or snake-eating cobra, of India consists almost entirely of other snakes. Whether or not it eats those of its own species is not known though it is quite likely that very young hamadryads would be none too safe within reach of a hungry adult.

Little Falls- An interesting display of glacial deposits which he has gathered on bluffs north of Little Falls at an elevation of approximately 80 feet higher than the city is owned by Joseph Wegerstseder. Pheasant Hits Bus, 3 People Are Injured

Waseca--An unusual accident occurred to an east bound bus last Saturday afternoon 3 miles east of here at Goose Lake, when a pheasant flew into the windshield of the carrier and injured three passengers. Miss Ellen Hastenes, a teacher at Comfrey suffered the greatest injury. She was in the front seat opposite the driver when the pheasant struck the windshield as she looked out a side window. Flying glass and possibly the claws of the pheasant cut an ugly gash from her left eye back into her scalp, just above her ear. Blood flowed profusely from the large wound and she was so weak from the loss of blood that it was necessary to return and take her to a local physician. The woundwas dressed and Miss Hestenes was taken to the Memorial hospital here until the next day when she was able to continue to her home.

Towns Urged To Start Beautification Progrrm

Cities and towns thruout the Red River Valley are being urged by T. M McCall, Northwest School and Station horticulturist, to formulate definite long time civic beautification programs with a view, not only of obtaining the greatest returns from temporary relief labor, but to insure maximum beautification results. Such projects may include street tree planting and maintenance, improvement of parks and waterfronts.

Many of the fast growing trees, such as box elder, cottonwood, and willow, which were used as street trees in the original planting of town sites are now past maturity and should be replaced with more permanent species. These should include the American elm, green ash, blackberry, basswood, or tree type Chinese elm. Evergreens do not make desirable street trees. Since but few cities have ordinances regarding species to use, it is highly desirable for property owners to cooperate with city officials.

Permanent trees should have the right of way which means that it may be necessary to move pole lines or if this is not possible, only medium height trees such as Mountain Ash should be planted. Street trees should be allowed to develop their full form and should not be dehorned or topped to accommodate telephone lines. The chief pruning necessary for street trees consists of starting a central leader and then cutting off low branches which interfere with traffic. According to Professor McCall, permanent trees of the larger growing species should be spaced from thirty to forty feet apart in the line of row, while smaller trees such as Mountain Ash and Chinese elm may be planted from 25 to 30 feet apart.

Road Workers Find Dreams Come True

Long Prairie--Dreams are coming true for road workers near Long Prairie Who hasn't had the dream of finding nickles and dimes while wandering through the grass, leading on to quarters and half dollars until a bushel or two of the coins has been picked up? But it all came true to men working on road projects in Ward township At least $40 has been found in small change and dollar bills in 2 weeks, and the workers are looking for more. It started when Frank Mace found 6 one dollar bills. The same day another worker found 2 bills, and 4 days later 8 silver dollars and a number of coins were picked up. Dimes, quarters and half dollars were found scattered about, with one gopher hole containing a small mint. The only apparent explanation is that at some fairly recent time a bank was robbed nearby and in fleeing the burglars dropped some of their ill-gotten gains. The coins do not seem to have been there long, and the bills are still quite fresh.

Should this resident come to the sheriff's office to pay, thus relieving him of the necessity of making the trip, $1 mileage will be deducted from the bill, leaving 80 cents to pay.

THE rain swept suddenly down upon Fifth avenue and drove the diners indoors. All but Constance who left her young man for a gap in the boxed hedge and ducked around the nearest corner. Like a bedraggled chicken running for cover, she thought a little hysterically, and hailed a passing cab.

"And that's that," murmured Constance settling herself as comfortably as possible, meaning that she had written a rather clever ending to an evening of adventure. Meaning that if a girl has been so indiscreet as to pick up a man, the better part of valor lies in flight.

Once back in her hotel room, surveying her rain-drenched self in the mirror, all fear vanished and all sense of shame as well. She was glad that she had got dust in her eye and had to have it removed by the best looking man in New York!

It had all happened because she had spent a two weeks' vacation in New York alone and this had been her last night. And dining all by yourself in one of those romantic sidewalk cafes between Madison and Washington squares wasn't so pleasant if you remembered that very shortly you must return to Mr. Berring and his typewriter back in Midvale.

The best looking young man she had ever seen was dining just two tables away quite alone.

A bit of Fifth avenue lodged in her eye. It felt more like the Empire State building, although it came out at the first dab of Constance's handkerchief. But Constance discarding all her aunt's teachings, had continued to wipe her eye and had even moaned a little for good measure. It had worked! The tall blond young man had left his seat to offer assistance. He had said: "You see, I've had a great deal of experience; my mother was always getting things in her eye. So if you'll permit me—"

Constance had submitted bravely to having her ridiculously long lashes rolled back on a match and to having the corner of a very large, very clean linen handkerchief inserted in a perfectly clear eye.

"There!" the young man had announced at last and gravely showed her a fleck of dust on his handkerchief.

So the blond young man moved over and they lingered over coffee and cigarettes. They exchanged names and other unimportant information which on Constance's part, at least, was strictly misleading. She still preferred to be a New Yorker down for her shopping! His name was Bill Maynard. He was the sort you called Bill at once. He had lived in New York all his life.

Bill was saying: "You're a real person, Constance. I mean—real."

Constance had wanted to say that she wasn't real, at least she wasn't what he thought her. She wanted to tell him that she was just a stenographer from the Middle West enjoying a vacation in New York.

"I'd like you to meet my mother. She's a darling. Taught me to scrub behind my ears; that hard work never hurt anyone; and not to tell lies."

"So many people do," murmured poor Constance, "tell lies, I mean."

"You couldn't," Bill had said confidently.

How could she tell him then?

* * * * * * *

A few days later she was walking the streets of her home town, jobless. She knew she ought to be registering at an employment agency but nothing seemed to matter now. She had lost her job and Bill. She looked at a store set back from the sidewalk and thought, "What a grand place for a sidewalk cafe."

Then said sternly to herself: "Look here, Constance, this won't do, you know. You've got to be nonchalant," and took out her compact to repair the damages from not being nonchalant.

After that she felt better. She could even face the wind which was blowing off Main street and then it happened again! All the dirt from Main street was in her eye and no amount of rubbing did any good.

She turned blindly toward the nearest door. She'd have to sit down and find her handkerchief; she'd have to find some one to help her. Only there wasn't any Bill now.

Some one inside was taking her elbow, leading her to a seat. A professional voice murmured, "It's rather dusty, isn't it? Now if you'll just hold still a moment—"

And then gentle, efficient fingers were rolling back her ridiculously long lashes.

"There, do you want to see what did the damage?"

Constance opened her eyes. She saw a glass case filled with eye glasses above which was a sign "We are Glad to Remove Dust from Your Eyes Free of Charge." She looked up and there was—

"Bill!"

"Constance!"

"But how, when, where—" It simply couldn't be true.

"You darling! did you think I'd let you get away so easily? In all that nonsense you told me, you had said you were stopping at the Treymore. And when I found that you were from Midvale, well, Midvale was as good a place to hunt for a job as any, so—"

"You found a job and I lost one."

"You only need one job in a family," said Bill confidently.

"I hadn't," and Constance smiled, "thought of that."

Win Ball Game

The local high school baseball team defeated the Thief River Falls high school team on the local grounds, Monday afternoon, by the score of 10 to 9.

The game was a real battle from beginning to end with both pitchers doing excellent work. The large scores obtained by the two teams was due to the fact that the catchers weren't up to par with the pitchers, many of the runners being safe due to a dropped third striked. Walter Odegaard on the mound for the locals struck out 13 and allowed five hits, while the two Prowler pitchers allowed 6 hits, but struck out 15.

St. Hilaire went into the last inning leading 7 to 6 and after striking out the first two men Odegaard let up a bit and the result was that Thief River Falls scored 3 runs on three hits the last being a homer by Adkins. St. Hilaire however came back in there last half to score a like number of runs to win the game.

St. Hilaire is now leading the teams of the district with its two wins and no defeats. The local team plays at Crookston on Friday. Goodridge High plays here next TUESDAY. Remember the date May 14.

Session Laws

Intermittent rains fell over this section all yesterday afternoon. The rain appeared to be heavier west of town than east. Seeding will be delayed a short time because of the rain, but the grain already in will get a good start.

Pension Law Invalid

Because of a mistake in engrossing, and incorporation of a paragraph not intended to be part of the law, it is very likely the old age pension act passed by the 1935 legislature will be declared invalid. Preliminary opinion by the attorney general is that the bill given to the governor for his signature, is not the same as was acted upon by the legislature.

In order to correct this, it will be necessary to have a special session this year if the pension is to become operative in 1935. Had there been no mistake made, the old age pension act would have gone into effect July 1st.

Since it is almost certain a special session of the legislature will be called this summer to take up tax matters, no doubt the pension act will be amended at that time, and old age pensions will be available during next fall or probably Jan 1st, 1936.

Fishing Season Opens

Opening of the wall-eyed pike season in Minnesota will be on Wednesday May 15. It will then be legal to also take sand pike, pickeral, great northern pike, yellow perch and muskellunge by angling. It is now legal to take by angling, bullheads, catfish, garfish, whitefish, not less than 16 inches in length, carp, redhorse, and sheephead, suckers, eelpout and buffalofish. These species may be taken by angeling all the year with exception of the months of March and April. Resident fishing licenses are 50 cents for individuals this year as they have been in the past.

He, together with companions, had been out hunting gophers and were returning home when the accident occured. In passing around another car that had stopped to go on a side road, they failed to note another ahead, and crashed into it, overturning their machine. Young Wilson suffered a crushed skull and died instantly. Others in the car was uninjured except as to bruises and small cuts.

The best ERA "chisel" story to date concerns a farmer on relief who told investigators he needed a new mattress for his bed. When the mattress was delivered, the farmer happened to be away. Workers, according to regulations burned the old mat and installed the new one. The next day he appeared at this certain ERA office in a rage. When asked to pour out his troubles, he blurted out "There was $600 sewed up in that old mattress".-Detroit Lakes Tribune.

Saves Splinters From Cyclone In Year 1889

LeCenter--Wood splinters driven into walls of buildings by the cyclone of 1889 form a unique collection of Mrs. John E. Krenik, LeCenter. The pieces comprise red oak, white oak, maple, basswood, elm, poplar, and crabapple and bring back memories of the big wind that swept everything in front of it The cyclone just missed the farm buildings of Mrs Krenik's father, but took heavy damage in the neighborhood. Mrs. Krenik wrapped the pieces together in an old newspaper, which carries the date of 1894, and has saved them for over 41 years.

Printed Guimpe Dresses Are Popular for Summer

Mainbocher makes a hit with his printed guimpe frocks, Lanvin with her button apron dresses, Augustabernard with her knee-length tunic and gathered back skirt frocks, Lelong with his accordian plaited front panel skirted frocks with frilled necklines, and Molyneux with his simple Japanese sleeved dresses that have plaid taffeta or white organdie sashes, gloves, and neck fixings. This house also puts chiffon sashes on wool frocks. Printed silk and cotton day frocks are everywhere and most of the flower prints are on dark grounds. Silk with checkered plaid, and cross-bar patterns are used everywhere for frocks, as are cottons and organdies in these patterns.

Banana Split

By LEONORA WOODWARD

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

MRS. TREESON found two empty stools before the soda fountain and drew them together to form one seat. She eased down her bulk with a sigh, displayed a ticket to the boy in the rakish white cap and said: "Three banana splits, please."

The boy flipped the banana splits expertly across the marble counter—three elongated glass dishes of this and that and what not piled with whipped cream topped by a luscious cherry. Mechanically his hands moved to spread two of them to right and left. Then his nonchalant air departed. His mouth gaped open in his pimpled face. Mrs. Treeson's neighbors were quietly sipping orange juice through straws.

"Leave them there," commanded Mrs. Treeson in the tone she reserved for all menials and tendered her check.

Mrs. Treeson pulled the nearest dish toward her, scooped up the cherry and thrust it in her small red mouth.

She had consumed the last of the ice cream before she became conscious that two slim young things at the turn of the counter were giggling into their compacts and pointing at her with their sharp, bright eyes. Not that she cared. Once she had been as slim as they. Why, Mr. Treeson—Sam—used to boast that his hands would meet around her waist. He'd even made good his boast by placing them there.

She caught a glimpse of herself in the fountain mirror. She was still pretty, she told herself, and young looking, although of course her flesh made her seem rather matronly. Her carefully marcelled blond hair didn't show a trace of gray. The new black hat tilted over one eye was vastly becoming and she had kept her cupid's bow mouth. Mr. Treeson—Sam—had said once that she had the most kissable mouth in the world. If it hadn't been for her double chin . . . yes, she really ought to begin reducing. She'd commence tomorrow, she told herself resolutely and put out her plump hands with their brightly polished nails for the second banana split.

She noticed again the way her wedding ring had become embedded in the folds of soft flesh. She'd never told Mr. Treeson—Sam—that she couldn't get it off. She knew that Mr. Treeson—Sam—would worry if he learned that she had been advised by her doctor to have it sawed off. He was a great hand to worry. As if getting fat were her fault!

"I guess fat just runs in my family," she had told him the other night when her last year's satin evening gown had burst its seams.

"Nonsense, it's your intake," he had said sharply. He was often sharp these days for no apparent reason.

"You talk as if I were a piece of machinery," she had protested; laughing good naturedly.

But after that she had stopped munching candy while she read—at least, she had stopped eating chocolates. Not that it seemed to make any difference. But she couldn't really enjoy a good detective story without peanut brittle. Now, of course, she had no business indulging in three banana splits but they were unusually good here; one never seemed to satisfy her, and it would be a good three hours before Mr. Treeson—Sam—would be ready to leave the office and go home with her. He worked awfully late these days. And she didn't come downtown much any more. Shopping exhausted her and made her feet swell. She rolled her pink tongue over the last spoonful of the second dish and reached for the third.

And then she saw them in the mirror, Mr. Treeson—Sam—and that pretty new secretary of his. Her spoon hung suspended in midair. Her chin quivered. She knew now that she had always been afraid of this. Afraid that Mr. Treeson—Sam—would take to running around with that hussy. Suddenly she remembered as if it were yesterday, something he had said on their honeymoon. They had been watching a stout woman climb into a chair on the boardwalk at Atlantic City. His words came back to her clearly after all these years.

"Fat," Mr. Treeson—Sam—had said, "ought to be recognized grounds for divorce." Of course he had been joking—she recalled how she had laughed at the time. But still, if he was going to make a fool of himself over—

She saw the way Mr. Treeson was smiling at the girl, that smile which had once turned her heart wrong side out. He hadn't smiled like that in years. She saw the girl lean toward him so that her shoulder touched the lapel of his coat—and then they were no longer there. Only her own face stared back at her; a pink and white face below carefully marcelled blond hair that didn't show a trace of gray. But somehow the new hat carefully tilted over one eye was too small and too young for the fat matronly face beneath, and the mouth was no longer a cupid's bow but a quivering line.

She'd begin to reduce—now. She looked down at the spoon in her shaking hand. There would be no need to wait for Mr. Treeson—Sam. She couldn't face that girl. She'd go home and sit by her electric fan and try to get interested in a good detective story. Maybe after awhile her heart would stop fluttering this way. She scooped up the cherry and bit into it with her even white teeth. It was cooling to her parched throat. Tomorrow she would begin to diet. Methodically she attacked the whipped cream; the banana beneath.

Dog Finds Lost Wallet With $96

Breckenridge--Some folks do not care for dogs, but they don't have a dog like the one owned by Ed Evenson, Foxhome resident. Evenson believes that the dog is the smartest animal on earth, and has some reason for believing so. Evenson lost his billfold containing $96 not long ago Nick Hennenfent discovered a dog playing with a billfold. Nick had the dog give him the pocketbook, and when he found $96 in it he brought it to Evenson. There is one dog in Foxhome that will not go hungry if Evenson knows about it.

Easter Bunny Crashes Through Windshield

An Easter rabbit arrived in an unusual fashion for George Grovedahle, of Sargeant, on the day before Easter. Grovedahl, with his mother, was riding along the road near Sargeant when a rabbit suddenly appeared on the road. The bunny, quite bewildered, did not know in what direction to go, so he took a flying leap and when he came down it was through the windshield and into Mrs. Grovedahl's lap.

Jumps From Plane To Pay Court Fine

Rochester--There are lots of better ways to pay court fines than jumping out of an airplane, and most prisoners would object but not so Roy D Webb, of Rochester. Hailed into court on a charge of passing a check for which he had no funds, Webb convinced the judge last week that if he were allowed one more day, he would make a parachute jump at Austin the next day, receive his usual fee $150, and cover the bad check. The complainant was interested only in getting his money back, and agreed to the proposition. He is a professional parachute jumper for fairs and exhibitions, and made 72 jumps last year and had been receiving up to $150 per jump. On Webb's promise to square his debts, Judge Gates deferred sentence until May 15.

Freak Pig Has Two Heads

Wabasha--A freak pig with 3 eyes, one like Cyclops, in the middle of his forehead, and with the head divided from there down into 2 complete "snoots" with one eye on either side, was born with a litter of 11 black Poland China pigs on the William E. Hook farm near Thielman. The pig lived only 20 minutes, his death being due not so much to its deformity as to the fact that his mother stepped on him.

Commencement exercises will take place at the school auditorium Friday evening, May 31st. As has been the custom the past few years no commencement speaker will be used, members of the graduating class will give short talks.

There are fifteen candidates for graduation in the Senior class this year, who are: James Bainbridge, George Bainbridge, Ardell Olsen, Walter Odegaard, Paul Jepson, Vincent Dalager, John Biskey, Elnora Swanson, Merle Rolland, Vivian Lindquist, Marie Skottem, Echo Norman, Adrian Olness, Rufus Olsen and Helen Marquette.

N. G. Stark

Funeral services were held Saturday afternoon at the Norwegian Lutheran church, with Rev. M. L. Dahle officiating, for the late N. G. Stark who died Tuesday, May 7, at his home in Sanders town.

Mr. Stark was born May 22, 1847, at Oland Sweden, and lacked two weeks of being 88 years of age at time of his death.

His early days were spent in his native land, and for over twenty years he was employed as a sailor, both on sailing vessels and later on steamers. In 1888 he came to the United States, settling in Sanders township which had been his home continuously since that time. About forty-three years ago he was united in marriage to Christina Anderson. Mr. Stark is survived by his widow and five children. The latter are Fred Stark of MacRorie, Sask, Can., Mrs. Gust Person of Duluth, Edwin, Axel, and Louise of this community. He also is survived by two grandchildren. Another son, Robert, died in 1923. All members of the family, excepting Fred, were present at the funeral.

Interment was in the family plot in the Lutheran cemetery north of the village.

Almost every freight train coming up this line carries one or more carloads of new tractors. Dealers all along the line report brisk demand for light type tractors, and manufacturers are being rushed to the limit to supply the demand.

Lose One; Win One

The St. Hilaire high school baseball team motored to Crookston last Friday and took the short end of the score. It was the first defeat for the locals this year. Crookston has a fine team and deserved victory as the local boys were nervous playing in the league park.

On Tuesday of this week the local team defeated Goodridge high school for the second time by a score of 4 to 0. Arlo Jacobson on the mound for St. Hilaire allowed only a scratch hit. He was given excellent support. The feature of the game was a homerun by Ardell Olsen. The Goodridge boys played a nice brand of ball but were outclassed by the locals.

The locals go to Thief River Falls on Friday and on Monday May 20 the Crookston High School team comes here. We would like a big crowd out for the Crookston game so remember the date.

P. T. A. Meets

Final meeting of the Parent-Teachers Association for the present school year was held at the school assembly last Friday evening. The Land O'Lakes Quartet of Thief River was present and rendered several greatly appreciated selections. Game Warden Walter Quist of Thief River, spoke on behalf of the proposed local Boy Scout organization. He explained different points and following his address, the P. T. A. voted to sponser a local Boy Scout organization.

Officers for the coming year were elected as follows, president, Mrs. L. E. Beebe, vice president, Mrs. R. A. Young, Secretary, Miss Bernice Anderson, Treasurer, Elmer Johnson.

Lunch was served from the domestic science room following the program.

Banquet Saturday

The annual Junior-Senior banquet at the local school will be held Saturday, May 18, starting at 6:00 P. M., at the school assembly. Plans are now being made to make this event one of the most memorable in history of the school. The Ladies Aid of the Norwegian Lutheran church will serve the banquet dinner.

Miss June Ortloff came up Friday from Red Lake Falls and spent until Saturday evening with friends and relatives.

Interment was made in the Wilson plot where Wallace's father was buried eleven years ago.

Allot Road Fund

Minnesota counties will receive about $200,000 more from the state road and bridge fund this year than in 1934. The State Board of Allotment has determined the available 1935 fund to be $4,411,647, as compared with $4,200,000 last year. The amount is an estimate made by the board of receipts from the one-mill state road tax and one-third of the state gasoline tax for the current year.

The one-mill tax is expected to yield $1,011,647 this year, or about same as last. Gas tax receipts for the counties is estimated at $3,400,000. Money from the one-mill tax goes to state-aid roads and gas-tax money to county-aid.

From the 1-mill tax Pennington county will receive $10,116.00 and its allotment from gas-tax money will be $25,500.00. Red Lake county is alloted the same amount, from both sources, for maintaining its road system this year.

Many local people have received copies of "dime mail letters" within the past ten days, and a few have received letters of the same type asking a quarter be sent to the name at the top of the list. Investigation by the postal department reveals fraud in connection with these letters. Parties in Colorado have sent out hundreds of such letters with their own name at top with hope of reaping a harvest before the fraud was discovered.

Solicitor General Karl A. Crowley of the legal division of the postoffice department says "The chain letter scheme is a violation of the lottery law because at time a person gets in on the chain he has no knowledge of extent to which the chain has already progressed, and in parting with his money, has no guarantee of receiving anything in return".

The letter scheme is a violation of the postal fraud statute because it is economically unsound and cannot possibly work out. Persons mailing out such letters may be denied use of the U. S. mails under existing laws.

Stranger Abandons Car, Trailer, Chicks

Worthington—Sheriff Nels A. Pederson is holding a car, a trailer, 42 chickens, and the personal effects of a driver of the automobile who got lost in the shuffle. It all started on a Tuesday morning, when the stranger drove into Worthington with his load of poultry on a trailer. Inquiring the sale price of the chickens at one buying station, the man left the buyer with suspicions aroused, and the sheriff was called. They followed the stranger to another station, where they found he had sold the chickens and had gone into the office to collect his money. Altho the sheriff waited some time, the stranger did not return for his money, apparently having just dropped out of the picture. Inquiry showed that the car belonged to a St. Paul man who was absent from home, and that the trailer and chickens were stolen from a farm in Stevens county the night before.

HELP FROM JULIAN

By R. H. WILKINSON

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

BEGINNING with the day that Julian Merrie had blackened the eye of the town bully for trying to kiss Nita Crandon, Julian had been Nita's hero.

At the time of the eye blackening, the pair had been aged twelve and eight respectively.

Now they were twenty-six and twenty-two, and the situation hadn't changed a great deal.

That is to say, Nita still looked upon Julian as a protector, a confidant, and an adviser.

A role which Julian filled willingly and capably.

Today as Nita sat before her bedroom window and looked out across the lawn of her father's estate, across the highway and along the drive that led to the home of Julian's father and the abiding place of Julian himself, her expression was one of forlorn distress.

At the moment she needed Julian's help and counsel more than ever before. Yet she was reluctant to seek him out.

It was possible, she thought, that Julian might not take kindly to this most important of all requests.

It was possible he'd laugh at her, chide her, make light of the situation.

That would hurt.

And to be hurt right now, especially by Julian, would be torture.

Nita took the time to reflect back to the day when Julian had blackened the eye of the town bully in her defense.

From this point forward her thoughts followed her own and Julian's career to the conclusion of grammar school, through high school, through college, and the years that followed after graduation.

And not once could she remember a time when Julian had failed to come to her aid, either voluntarily or at her request.

He had been noble, kind, thoughtful, always considerate and concerned with her problems as much as though they had been his own.

No, she decided, he would not fail her now.

Not Julian.

No matter what the nature of her troubles might be.

And so Nita climbed down from the window seat, arranged her hair, powdered her nose, caught up a wrap and went out.

She found Julian down on the shore of the lake that bordered on the Merrie place.

He was tinkering with a motor of an old power boat.

His hands were greasy and his face was streaked.

He seemed to be on the point of exasperation, yet at Nita's step he looked up, and at sight of her the exasperated look departed and was replaced by a cheerful and welcoming grin.

"Hello," he said, sitting down on the gunwale.

"Glad you dropped over. Soon's as I get this old tub fixed I'll give you a ride."

Nita did not return the grin.

She sat down on the wharf's edge, letting her feet dangle, and stared soberly out over the shimmering blue of the lake.

Julian puckered his brow into a frown, ceased idly drumming with a hammer handle on the gunwale, and waited. He knew the signs.

Presently Nita said, without looking up:

"Julian, ever since we've been kids I've come to you with my problems, heaped my burdens on your shoulders. And you've always been kind and helpful. Always sort of—looked after me."

Julian scratched his chin with a grimy forefinger.

"Sure, Nita, why not? You've always been like a sister to me. Why shouldn't I look after you?"

Nita gnawed at her lips and hesitated. Then:

"Julian, I'm in trouble now, and you've got to help me."

Julian slid down on the wharf close beside her.

"Of course, Nita."

Nita turned and looked at him squarely.

"Julian, I'm in love!"

Julian's jaw sagged open.

Surprise, pain, incredulity came into his eyes and were replaced by blank astonishment.

"In love, Nita! You! In love! Nita, for heaven's sake"

Nita suddenly looked away.

"I knew you wouldn't believe me; knew you wouldn't take me seriously. Oh, Julian, can't you understand that it's driving me insane!"

Julian gulped and laid a grimy hand on her white frock.

"But Nita, I do understand. Of course. You took me by surprise. I—well, it always seemed—that is—who is he, Nita? Why don't you marry him?"

Nita buried her face in her hands.

"That's just it. That's why I came to you. He won't ask me!"

"Won't ask you! You mean he doesn't love you! Why, the skunk, I'll—just tell me his name! He can't get away with a thing like that!"

"Don't be absurd, Julian. You can't use violence in a case such as this. You can't force a man to love a girl! We—we must think of some other way."

Julian nodded dully, as if the logic of her words had suddenly occurred to him also.

He drew away his hand and stared moodily out over the lake.

For a long moment they remained thus.

At last Nita turned to look at him.

"Julian, can't you think of some way?"

Julian didn't return her look.

"Nita, I don't want you to get married!"

"Don't want me to! Julian, whatever are you saying? Why shouldn't I get married? Why don't you want me to?"

He didn't reply at once, and Nita went on:

"I know what you're thinking. You're thinking he's a cad for making me miserable. But he isn't, Julian. He's wonderful and grand and handsome. And, oh, he could make me so happy. I've waited and waited for him to propose. And—and now, Julian, I've come to you for help. You simply must think of something!"

Julian turned at last and met her gaze squarely.

"It isn't that that I was thinking, Nita. I wasn't thinking about him, or how miserable he's made you, or how to solve your problem."

Nita looked at him aghast.

"You weren't! Then you don't care! Then you won't help me; don't want to help me?"

"I was thinking," Julian went on, "that it isn't fair. It isn't fair at all—to have you want to marry."

"Fair? I don't believe I understand, Julian. What isn't fair?"

"It isn't fair," said Julian, drawing close to her, "it isn't fair to have you love some one else when—"

He suddenly reached out, and his arms encircled her in a fierce grip.

He drew her toward him.

His lips crushed against hers.

She yielded.

He held her thus for, it seemed, an eternity.

He kissed her again and again.

Hot passionate kisses that sent little tremors vibrating through her body.

At last he released her, looked fiercely into her eyes.

"It isn't fair," he continued huskily, "for you to want to marry some one else, when I love you madly, when I've always loved you, when I've dreamed endlessly of the day when I can claim you all for my own. That's what isn't fair!"

Breathless, flushed, her eyes shining with a strange, unaccountable light, Nita clung to him tenderly.

"Julian! Julian! Dear, darling, Julian! It is fair! It is! Don't you see? Can't you understand what I was trying to say! Trying to make you do?"

And when he stared at her in speechless incredulity, she went on happily.

"Julian, darling, precious, you're the man! You are the man I'm in love with, who won't ask me to marry him, who is making me miserable!"

And then the white frock became more grease besmeared than ever.

Birthplace of Permanent Wave Claimed by Britain

It is interesting to learn, as one of the results of the hairdressing exhibition at Olympia, says the Manchester Guardian Weekly, that it is British hairdressers who claim to have discovered, in the year 1907, the art of applying a permanent wave to tresses that would otherwise be as straight as the path of duty.

For it seems an epoch-making event to have put the permanent wave on the restless sea of fashion—perhaps the most important contribution to waves and their behavior from this country since Britannia began to rule them. One has a feeling that other countries might possibly challenge the British origin of what is now so widespread an addition to the resources of civilization—but then other countries are always challenging something, including the original Britannia's supposedly commanding interest in wave management on the ocean model.

And any little arguments over the waves of the hair are certainly likely to lead to less trouble than conflicts about command of the sea. In the matter of expense there may be not much in it; it possibly costs about as much to keep all the permanent waves of old England in working order (for their permanence is not so imperishable as it sounds) as it does to build a few battleships.

Largest Ranches

Probably the largest ranch in the United States, according to Winter's book "Texas the Marvelous," is the X I T ranch in the panhandle section of Texas, owned by the Farwell brothers of Chicago. This is said to amount to three million acres in all. The King ranch, situated in Kleberg county, Texas, is over a million acres. The Kennedy ranch in Texas near the gulf coast, is about 800,000 acres. The Hearst ranch at San Simeon, Calif., is about 240,000 acres. The Arnold X U ranch in northwest Nebraska and southwest South Dakota is about 100,000 acres. According to Winkler's biography of Hearst, the Mexican Hearst ranch at Babicora, Chihuahua, is a million acres. Another million acre ranch in Durango, Mexico, is that of Higginbotham brothers of Dallas.

The Mandrake

Ancients believed in the magic power of the mandrake and there are many legends based upon the properties of this peculiar root, which in the Middle ages was used for various potions. The plant was supposed to contain magic. Modern scientists say the root contains a potent narcotic stronger than morphine.

Engine From 1926 Car Makes Tractor A Freak

Austin—A tractor with a "bum" engine isn't much good, but Albert Spinler, farmer near Austin, purchased a 4 cylinder engine from a 1926 car for $6 and with a little tinkering he has a tractor that will pull a five-horse load half a day at five miles an hour without heating. The tractor is equipped with lights, self-starter, speedometer, ammeter, and fan that blows toward the radiator instead of the engine, causing the radiator to remain cool and also drawing crank-case smoke away from the driver. It took a little hard labor and quite a bit of mechanical skill, but Spinler now has a freak that is drawing quite a bit of attention from nearby farmers.

HUMBLE ALPACA IS NOW STYLE LEADER

Used in Hats, Frocks, Bags and Even Shoes.

Alpaca, that humble fabric once restricted to office coats for bookkeepers and Sunday best dresses for stern old ladies, is another Cinderella of fashion suddenly lifted out of the kitchen to take its place as the darling of the stylists.

Hats, frocks, coats, handbags and even shoes are being fashioned of this time-honored fabric this season, and the well-dressed debutantes are eating them up.

Checked alpaca makes one of the year's doggiest sports frocks cut in simple shirtwaist fashion, with a wide collar and windsor tie, and worn with a fingertip length double-breasted reefer of the same material in solid color. Navy and white is a favorite color combination, running neck and neck with brown and white.

The alpaca Breton sailor, in navy, brown or black, makes a striking bonnet when trimmed with band and piping of patent leather.

The solid color alpaca sailor suit, in navy blue, with white linen collar and the usual nautical emblems, is a knockout when it consists of double-breasted jacket, slim skirt and white sailor blouse.

Alpaca is substituted for tweed or gabardine in some of the new fabric walking shoes, with reptile or patent leather trim, and the handbags, as always, match.

SUITS OF LINEN

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

A tailored suit of the new soft uncrushable Irish linen is certainly to be coveted. The linen which fashions the jacket and skirt two-piece pictured is the non-crushable sort. It launders to perfection, tailors faultlessly, wears like iron, comes in intriguing colors as well as its own natural tone, flaunts an air of ultra chic—what more could one ask for in the way of a material for a summer town and travel suit? The reefer jacket which stylizes this tailleur is classically simple. The slim straight lines are broken only by two patch pockets. An interesting treatment of the sleeves gives them a good set as they are cut in one with the shoulders. The advent of uncrushable linen has completely done away with the fear of wrinkling your dress or suit for it just doesn't wrinkle, which makes it ideal.

HERE'S CHAPTER ABOUT PUDDINGS

Great Variety for Those Who Like Them.

By EDITH M. BARBER

DO YOU like puddings? You either like them or you don't. I find that most men have a prejudice in favor of old-fashioned rice pudding, although I did meet a man recently who lumps all puddings together as the lowest class of food. Apple pie is the only dessert, and he would like to have it every night. The fact, however, that most of the chop houses specialize in rice pudding shows that he is a radical. Personally, I like nothing better than creamy rice pudding cooked for hours in the oven. I also like rice steamed in milk and served with fruit or maple sugar and cream. Then there is that custard rice pudding, which, when flavored with vanilla and a bit of almond, is so delicious.

Another pet pudding of mine is cream tapioca which, by the way, can be made very quickly by the new type tapioca which cooks in five minutes. You have probably heard me mention my favorite cranberry tapioca, but I am not sure whether I have told you so often about the fig and nut tapioca made with brown sugar. Nothing is better than a good pudding of this type and nothing is worse than a poor one. A favorite combination of my childhood was made with stewed apples, heavily sweetened, and flavored with cinnamon and grated lemon rind. All these puddings should be chilled thoroughly before they are served.

The third number of this group of puddings is made with cornstarch. Every dessert of this type must be well cooked and nothing is less appetizing than a raw cornstarch pudding. All sorts of names are used to describe this dessert. There is blanc mange which is seldom seen as the title would indicate, as we have no scruples about putting chocolate, coffee or caramel before the title. When I was a child a spade was called a spade, and I shall never forget the disappointment when the first time I was taken to a hotel for a meal I ordered intriguing blanc mange. I still remember that square of gray, leathery material which floated in a colorless sauce. However, that is a thing of the past, and puddings which are given that name are usually good even at restaurants. Our home products are usually the favorite desserts in our repertoire. If a "white mountain" is served it is usually fluffy with egg whites and well flavored with vanilla or almond and sometimes with coconut. This is, by the way, very good with chocolate or caramel sauce or with crushed fruit.

There are a number of mixtures which need only cooking and cooling to provide a very good pudding. Cornstarch is used in some of them to provide the thickening, but some of the best have a mixture of arrowroot and gelatin. Arrowroot is occasionally used at home in the preparation of these puddings. It has a larger thickening power than cornstarch.

Occasionally flour is used as a thickening for puddings. It is particularly good in cream fillings for pie and for the dessert known as Boston or Washington cream pie. This filling may be flavored with chocolate, with browned almonds or with coffee or with caramelized sugar. There was, and perhaps there still is, a market restaurant in Philadelphia which specializes in this type of dessert. The filling is put between oblong pieces of sponge cake and it is covered with a liberal portion of whipped cream, sweetened and flavored. Sometimes cut oranges or bananas are mixed with the filling and used as a garnish on top of the cake or pie. Occasionally thin slices of sponge cake are covered with cream filling, rolled, chilled and served with a sauce or whipped cream.

Old-Fashioned Rice Pudding.

4 cups milk
¼ cup rice
½ teaspoon salt
¼ cup sugar
Nutmeg

Wash the rice, mix it with the other ingredients, and pour into a buttered baking dish. Bake two hours in a very slow oven (275 degrees Fahrenheit), stirring at least three times during the first hour to break the crust which will form. One-half cup of raisins may be added when the pudding is mixed. Serve very cold.

Cream Tapioca.

4 tablespoons pearl tapioca or
1⅓ tablespoons minute tapioca
2 cups scalded milk
⅓ cup sugar
2 eggs
¼ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla

Soak pearl tapioca for one hour in cold water to cover and drain. Minute tapioca does not need soaking. Add it to the milk and cook it in a double boiler until the tapioca is transparent. Add the sugar and salt to the egg yolks, slightly beaten. Pour the hot mixture slowly over this, return to the double boiler and cook until it thickens. Remove it from the fire and add the stiffly beaten egg whites. Add flavoring and chill the pudding.

Fig Tapioca.

¾ cup granulated tapioca
½ teaspoon salt
½ cup brown sugar
3½ cups boiling water
1 cup chopped figs
½ cup chopped nuts

Cook tapioca, salt and boiling water together until clear. Add sugar, figs and nuts. Cook five minutes, chill and serve with cream.

Culture Pearls

Culture pearls are simply genuine pearls whose growth and formation in the oyster has been artificially induced The principal difficulty about producing such pearls is that they frequently have a flat surface on one side where the pearl has been attached to the shell. However, a method has been devised whereby the pearl grows into the mantle of the oyster without touching the shell, and pearls of this type resemble natural pearls so exactly that the difference cannot be discovered except by cutting the pearl open. Culture pearls of this high type can be used in jewelry and strung for necklaces just as natural pearls can be.

Crow Is a "Gangster".

Among the outstanding enemies of Bird Life, especially the quail, is the crow and the house cat. The cat is a useful creature if confined to the home and barn, but becomes an outstanding menace to bird life when they acquire the habit of hunting. The crow can rightfully be called a "gangster," this commonly being their mode of attack—while part of them will run a bird from the nest and harrass them, others will carry off the eggs or fledglings.

Lawyers on Witness Stand

The Code of Ethics of the American Bar association says that when a lawyer is a witness for his client, except merely as to formal matters such as the attestation or custody of an instrument and the like, he should leave the trial of the case to other counsel. Except when essential to the ends of justice, a lawyer avoids testifying in court in behalf of his client.

POULTRY

EARLY CHICKS KEY TO INCOME ON EGGS

Birds Likely to Come Into Fall Production.

By M. L. Mosher, Farm Management Division, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

One of the first things that poultrymen can do in the new year to increase their average annual cash income of $20,000,000 from eggs is to buy or hatch their baby chicks early enough in the season.

When properly fed and cared for, early-hatched chicks are more likely to come into egg production in the fall months when prices are higher.

In a group of 26 north-central Illinois farms last year the egg sales amounted to an average of $104 more in the same area because the hens were raised and fed to produce more eggs during the fall and winter months when prices were good. The extra feed used to bring the pullets into early production amounted only to $36 a farm, thus leaving $68 a farm more above feed costs.

The records kept on these 121 farms showed that the 26 better-paying flocks produced 25 per cent or more of their eggs during October, November and December. These same flock owners received an average of five cents a dozen more for all eggs sold during the year than did the other 95 farmers whose birds produced less than 10 per cent of their eggs in the high-price season. The feed cost was only 1¾ cents a dozen more on the farms producing the higher percentage of fall and winter eggs. These differences in selling price and feed costs, when applied to all eggs produced on the farms accounted for the average $68 increase in egg profits.

An average of 40 more eggs were produced by each hen on the farms that fed for fall and winter production. Higher quality of hens, better sanitation and health practices and improved feeding methods, all contributed to this larger production. That the hens were kept busy laying eggs throughout more of the year seemed to be an important reason for the greater average production for each bird in the 26 better-paying flocks.

Allow Ten to Fourteen Turkey Hens to One Tom

Ordinarily, about ten turkey hens should be mated to one tom, but if the pen be large 12 to 14 hens may be used with a single young tom, says the Missouri Farmer. If a large flock of hens are kept, several toms can be used on the hens, in which case they should be alternated—one tom allowed with the hens one day, and another tom the next day, etc. Such a mating makes for extra good fertility because the toms have a chance to rest and feed on alternate days. Also if one tom should happen to be sterile the eggs from hens with which he mates will not be lost. Furthermore, if toms are alternated they can be used on a larger number of hens than where they are used entirely with an individual pen.

If two or more pens are kept they should be separated so that the toms cannot fight through the fence and thus waste their time as well as weaken themselves. More than one tom should not be placed in the breeding pen at one time unless the pen is large, embracing several acres. Nests should be provided which may be a barrel, a large box, or a brushpile, and one nest should be available for every five hens.

Old Poultry Lore

In a book written about 1750, M. De Reaumur, a Frenchman, stated: "To avoid cannibalism, do not crowd the chicks. Weak legs are prevented by sunlight. Moisten feed to fatten poultry. Feed animal protein. Do not expand beyond the food supuly. Infertile eggs keep better than fertile eggs. The feed affects the flavor of the egg." In those days they knew nothing of vitamins, proteins, the importance of balanced rations, and so on, but it is evident that they had learned a great many things by observation that later have been proved out by experimental work.

Eliminate Infected Hens

Some good reasons for eliminating infected hens from farm flocks are: First, the fertility of eggs from infected hens is low. On the average, 71 per cent of chicks which are hatched from infected eggs die of pullorum disease. Infected hens lay on the average less than half the eggs that healthy hens lay. Thirty per cent of reacting hens, on the average, die annually, whereas the normal death rate in farm flocks is estimated at about 10 per cent.

Use Stale Storage Eggs

The Chinese use duck eggs, which they prize very highly after they have been stored for a long time. The eggs are stored in barrels with a coat of mud over them and mixed with lime or salt and pine needles. The older the eggs get the more valuable they are. They turn very black and naturally acquire a very strong taste and odor. When they are taken out of the preservative they are simply eaten as they are or perhaps flavored with soy sauce.

Court Reporter Spends 47 Years In Service

Marshall--47 years as court reporter in the court at Marshall is claimed by W. T. Eckstein, who is probably the oldest court reporter in the country from the standpoint of service. Despite his long service in the courts Mr. Eckstein is a comparatively young man and carries his years well, looking forward to celebrating his golden anniversary in that position in 1938. The years spent in recording the troubles and quarrels of humanity have not dimmed his youthful eyes nor affected his balanced attitude toward life, for he is a calm, restful appearing man with a glint of dry humor in his voice and eyes.

State Boasts Orange Tree That Produces

Worthington-M. P. Thornton's orange tree is again bearing fruit. The tree its really more of a plant as its dwarfed and stands less than a foot high grows in a pot and is kept in the office of Walter Pfeil in the court house. One organge is beginning to ripen and another is now about an inch and a quarter in diameter. Two others are beginning to form. Last year Mr. Thornten ate an orange from the tree and reported while it undoubtedly was an organge, it had little flavor. The tree is several years old and despite its size manages to produce fruit each year.

Making Batik

In making batik, the design is first sketched on the cloth with a pencil; then all the intricate portions which are to be protected from the first dye are carefully covered on both sides of the cloth with melted wax. This is done by hand, by means of a tiny spouted cup the size of a thimble. By dyeing, removing the wax, re-waxing and re-dyeing several times, the piece of batik is finally made. It seems simple enough, but weeks, or perhaps months, of patient labor go into its making. Some of the best cloth, worked in beautiful designs, is restricted to the use of royalty and the court dancers.

Lentil Ancient Food

Lentils are not produced to any great extent in this country, though a small variety of lentil is grown in New Mexico and Arizona, as well as in Mexico, the seed of which was probably brought from Spain centuries ago. The lentil is a very ancient food and has been cultivated in western Asia, Egypt and the Mediterranean countries from the earliest times. Germany, Holland and France also raise them, but it is stated that most of our imports have come from southern Europe and Egypt.

Corkwood

While true cork is not found in this country, some varieties of trees with light, porous wood have been named corkwood. These are principally found in semi-tropical swamps of Florida and Texas and muddy sloughs in southeastern Missouri. The buoyant wood of these trees is utilized for floats and toy airplanes.

Protected With Pitch

Noah's Ark is described as "pitched within and without" to guard it against the floods. According to Pliny, the early Greeks, too, preserved their ships with a preparation of boiled wax, after which "neither the sea nor the wind nor the sun can destroy the wood thus protected."

Diseases may appear and disappear in the world, says a pathologist, citing the sweating sickness which attacked England in the Sixteenth century and trench fever which appeared during the World war, neither of which continued to exist.

The Word "Mother"

The word "mother" comes from the Anglo-Saxon "moder," but the root goes far back to the dawn of language, and a similar root is found in India and among many peoples. The first use of the word "mother" is not known.

Monks Watch Washers Then Scour Own Cage

Duluth--As workers whose diligence deserves reward, Tom and Jerry, chimpanzees at the Duluth zoo have few peers. For these 2 members of the monkey tribe these days are busily engaged in scouring their cage, tirelessly and without other remuneration than their daily fare. It all came about when a group of workmen were assigned to scrub the bars and walls of the adjoining cage. The 2 chimps observed the technique of the crew, set up a howl until they were supplied with rags and water and forthwith scaled the bars and scoured with an energy not exhibited in the other cage. Of the two, Jerry would rate the most proficient. She scrubs without a respite while her male companion exhibits a tendency to loaf occasionally.

DIETING POINTS PATH TO HEALTH

Varied Meal Suggestions Listed by Expert.

By EDITH M. BARBER

The other day I was talking with a doctor who makes a specialty of treating digestive ailments, and he told me some illuminating things in regard to the difficulties of persuading his patients to follow his directions in regard to diet.

"Isn't it odd," he asked, "patients who will take the bitterest medicine without a protest and the most strenuous treatments without a murmur just will not follow a strict diet." This was further illustrated by an experience in a large sanitarium where meat, coffee, tobacco and condiments are forbidden. Practically all the patients take acidophilous milk and one day a disturbing bacterium invaded the day's supply. This caused uncomfortable symptoms among the patients, and one by one each confessed to his doctor that he had been to town and indulged in one of the forbidden foods! And each patient was there spending time and money to profit by the treatment which he knew beforehand was mainly dietetic.

Many—most of the ailments which are now treated in this way could have been prevented by the proper diet established as a habit early in life. This would mean at the same time, the elimination of almost all medicine.

A medical magazine not long ago published an item entitled "How Much Medicine Does a Man Take?" The answer is that "statisticians tell us that the average man fifty years old has taken, in the course of his lifetime, forty pounds of epsom salts, ten gallons of alcohol, five pounds of aspirin, ten pounds of sodium bicarbonate, and various other medicines."

Does it not seem absurd that the idea of preventing disease by diet has not penetrated the consciousness of most people? This is especially true of constipation. If this condition is present, they take a cathartic—which ultimately may do more harm than good.

New Personal Property Law Causes Confusion

Operation of the law covering the elimination of household goods and farm machinery from the personal property assessment is explained in a letter from N. A. Nelson, secretary of the Minnesota Tax commission, to assessors.

Confusion has prevailed among assessors as to the interpretation of the ruling governing assessing of household furnishings. This ruling exempts from assessment all of the items listed under Class 2 in the assessment manuals, where such property is owned by the person residing within the home, the letter points out.

It does not, however, exempt household goods in apartment houses, tourist camps, lake cottages, or other dwellings where such household goods are owned by the owners of the buildings or leasors and are furnished to the renters, the letter explains.

The new law exempts not only actual household furnishings, but personal belongings, clothing, jewelry and bric-a-brac. In addition to this exemption, each personal property owner is entitled to a $25 exemption on any other holdings he may have.

The ruling on the assessment of farm machinery now exempts from taxation all farm tools, implements and machinery used in the cultivation of a farm, except tractors, threshing machines, combines, silo cutters and fillers, corn shellers and pea viners.

Mrs. Edgar Peterson Dies Monday Morning

A death both unexpected and extremely sad, occured Monday morning when Mrs. Edgar Peterson of River Falls township died at a Thief River Falls hospital after an illness of only two days of heart trouble. Agnes Peterson, nee Anderson, was the youngest daughter of Anton E. Anderson of River Falls. She was born in that township December 3, 1910 and was only 24 years, 5 months and 17 days of age at time of her death.

She grew to womanhood in this community, and attended the local high school, graduating with the class of 1929. Her marriage to Edgar Peterson occured last October 31st, less than seven months ago. A bright, winsome young woman, Mrs. Peterson had many friends thruout this community who are deeply grieved over her sudden and unexpected death.

Besides her young husband, Mrs. Peterson is survived by her father, Anton E. Anderson, and by four sisters and one brother. The latter are: Mrs. Clifford Foss of Masinasin, Alta, Can., Mrs. Floyd Otte of Cannon Falls, Mrs. Horace Prugh of Thief River Falls, Mrs. Arthur Peterson and Edwin Anderson of this community. Her mother preceded her in death February 1, 1931.

Funeral services will be conducted today from the local Swedish Lutheran church with Rev. H. A. Larson officiating. Interment will be at the cemetery east of the village. Heartfelt sympathy of many friends is extended to the bereaved husband and other relatives in their sad loss.

Assessors Work Under New Tax Exemptions

With the personal property work under way in this county, assessors for the first time work under the new law eliminating personal property taxes on household goods and farm machinery. The law was passed by the recent session of the legislature in accordance with a majority vote given at the general election last November to a constitutional provision to eliminate such taxes.

Under provisions of the law, all household goods are now exempt from taxation. In the exemption also is all farm machinery of each farm used for agricultral or farming purposes, except tractors, silo cutters and fillers, threshing machines, combines, corn shellers and pea viners.

This new law will be tried for the first time in this state. The law is intended to give some tax relief, altho in many cases what a taxpayer may save here might conceivably be charged back against his real estate under a higher tax rate. In view of an increase of three mills in the state tax levy, it is imperative to keep local levies at normal or less, otherwise taxpayers will find their tax bills larger instead of smaller in the coming year.

Have Narrow Escape

While returning home last Friday night from a trip to Grand Forks, Ed Erickson, accompanied by Ed Peterson had an experience they do not want repeated. While nearing the St. Vincent line tracks, on the narrow state road west from here, a car with exceedingly bright lights approached them from the east. Blinded by the light, Mr. Erickson leaned out the car window on his side to get a better view of the road which was quite narrow at that point. As the car came close, someone in it made a lurid remark and without warning fired a shot at Erickson, the bullet going thru his hat brim and creasing his forehead. Temporarily stunned, Mr. Erickson lost control of his car which went in the ditch, while the other machine drove on toward Grand Forks without stopping. No explanation can be given for the unprovoked assult.

Ed Shaskey motored here Sunday from Fargo and spent until Monday with Mrs. Shaskey and son who are visiting at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Lars Loberg.

Mrs. A. E. Anderson

Mrs. A. E. Anderson, one of the pioneers of Black River community, who for the past few years had resided at Holt, died at her home in that village last Friday after an illness of a few months.

Mrs. Anderson was born in Skaraborgs Lan, Sweden, June 15, 1843, and was 91 years, 11 months and 2 days of age at the time of death. She was united in marriage to Alexander Larson in Sweden. He came to Chicago in 1879 and was followed by wife and family the following year. After a short residence in Chicago, they came to Black River in 1883 and two years later Mr. Larson passed away leaving his widow and four children to work the homestead, In 1888 Mrs. Larson was united in marriage to A. Anderson, who preceded her in death in 1918. One daughter was born to this union.

Mrs. Anderson is survived by three sons, Emil, Thomas and Richard, who all reside here, and by two daughters, Mrs. A. Sandberg of Holt, and Mrs. John Scholin of Black River. Twenty-three grandchildren and 20 great grandchildren also mourn her passing.

Funeral services were held Tuesday at the Black River Swedish Lutheran church. Rev. H. A. Larson conducted the services being assisted by Rev. Reidal of Holt. A quartette from Holt, and a quartet and choir of Black River church sang beautiful and appropriate numbers. Six grandsons of the deceased served as pallbearers, and interment was in the cemetery adjoining the church.

Sympathy of numerous friends thruout this community is extended to the bereaved relatives.

Examinations Held

The summer round-up health examination of pre-school age and other children was held at the school building Monday afternoon. Drs. Lynde, Smith, and Borreson of Thief River Falls, and Dr. D. S. Horn of Ulen were present, together with assistants, to make the examinations. These periodical examinations are of great value to the children, and it is to be hoped they will be held annually or oftener.

Carl A. Nelson and children of Fargo, motored here Saturday. The children visited at the home of their grandmother, Mrs. Mary Sherva, while Mr. Nelson attended to business at Thief River. They returned home Saturday afternoon. Mr. Nelson has a fine position as manager of a National Tea Company store at Fargo.

Excavation work is under way in preparation for starting construction of the new postoffice building at Thief River Falls.

Mrs. Nels Pearson

Mrs. Nels Pearson, a resident of St. Hilaire for fifteen years, and of this community for 47 years, died yesterday morning at her home in the village. She suffered a stroke some time ago and had gradually failed since that time.

Mrs. Pearson, nee Matilda Swanson, was born in Skane, Sweden, on August 10th, 1857, and would have been 78 years of age her next birthday anniversary. She was united in marriage to Nels Pearson in the old country Dec. 29, 1886, and they came to this country in 1888, settling in Black River community where they resided until they moved into the village in 1920 to spend their declining years.

Besides her husband, Mrs. Pearson is survived by a family of four sons and five daughters: Carl and Henry Pearson of this village, Mrs. Jasper of Crookston, Ed Pearson of Holler, Minn., Mrs. Gabe Henry of Ft. Francis, Ont., Can., Arvid of Flint, Mich., Mrs. Theo. LaMont of Grafton, N. D., Mrs. A. Melin of Metiskow, Alta., Can., and Mrs. Chas. Bratt of Gowrie, Ia. She also is survived by 32 grandchildren.

Funeral services will be held Saturday afternoon at 2:00 at the Swedish Lutheran church with Rev. H. A. Larson officiating. Interment will be at the cemetery east of the village.

Sympathy of many friends in the village and vicinity is extended to Mr. Pearson and members of his family in their time of sorrow.

A Noble Sacrifice

The Junior Class of the Warren High School showed their true worth and colors when they decided to cancel their prom and use the money as a memorial to Wallace Wilson, their classmate who met an early death in an automobile accident. The gift for such a worthy cause as this, will be a memorial to the class also, for the idea was formulated and carried out by the students themselves.

An incident such as this should give us pause to think about sacrificing something we want for something more worthy and beneficial for those with whom we come in contact.—Warren Sheaf.

Good progress is being made on north half of the new Larson Bros block now in course of construction. Exterior work is about finished and ceiling of the interior and placing of the front will be done this week. As soon as possible, they will move their stock into the new part and will commence wrecking their present quarters in preparation for erecting south half of the new store.

Electric light and power bills for the past month are due and payable at the Spectator office by evening of Tuesday, May 28th.

Amateur Review Drew Large Crowd

The Amateur Review, sponsered by the local Women's Club and held at the Young & Olsen hall last Friday night, was a huge success from every standpoint. Fifteen different individuals and groups were entered in the competition for the prizes offered. Each number was very well given, and was roundly applauded by an audience which filled the hall to capacity. The numbers were all so good that it was difficult to select winners so the Club hit on the idea of letting the audience express its choice by ballot. Elroy Johnson with a black-faced comedian song number, won first place. Marguerite Dahle with a vocal solo was awarded second; Marie Erdmann with a piano selection won third, and Melvin Swenson won fourth by his yodel song with guitar accompaniment. Following the program, cafeteria lunch was served in the club rooms at rear of the hall building. The Woman's Club is to be congratulated for working out such a fine entertainment, and we hope they will repeat it later on.

Here From Tacoma

Visitors in St. Hilaire and vicinity last Thursday and Friday were Mr. and Mrs. Walter Johnson of Tacoma, Wash., both residents of this village some years ago. Mr. Johnson is now superintendent of a sawmill plant at Tacoma. As nearly all mills in the coast country are closed because of a strike at present, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson decided to take an opportunity to visit relatives and old friends in Minnesota and arrived here Thursday by car. They visited at homes of his aunts, Mrs. A. Aug Erickson of River Falls, Mrs. Emma Samuelson of Wyandotte, and Mrs. Chas. Fellman Red Lake Falls besides calling on old friends in this village. They left Friday afternoon to visit Mrs. Johnson's sisters, Mrs. Hesby at Fargo, Mrs. Gertrude Hofgren at Minneapolis and with her brothers, Chas. Hooper at Madison, Wis, and John Hooper at Chicago, and at home of his sister, Mrs. Colie Guy at St. Cloud before returning home. This was Mr. Johnson's first trip back to Minnesota in over twenty-five years. They were able to give much interesting information about location, etc., of many former St. Hilaire people who now reside in towns in Washington. They noted many changes in this part of Minnesota since they left years ago.

Farmers Will Vote On Fate Of AAA

Nearly 25,000 Minnesota farmers will go to the polls Saturday, May 25th, to vote on whether the government shall continue its program of crop production control, or discontinue it. Those who will vote are wheat growers who have co-operated with the government in the control program. Non-signers of contracts will be permitted to vote providing they can prove to township committees that they are eligible to sign contracts.

This referendum is being taken among all farmers of the grain belt on the same day. Ballots have been distributed in the different counties and voting will take place in community polling places between 1:00 and 9:00 P. M.

Polling places thruout the county has been selected as follows: Polk Center Twp, C. E. Naplin's home; Bray Twp, Iver Johnson school, Sanders Twp, Ness school No. 194; River Falls and Black River Twps, St. Hilaire creamery; Wyandotte, Mayfield, and Deer Park Twps, Bruggeman school No 125; Rocksbury Twp, Valhall; North Twp, County Agent's office; Silverton and Cloverleaf, Silverton Town Hall; Goodridge, Reiner, Star and Highlanding, Korstad's store at Highlanding: Smiley and Kratka Tws, at B. B. Hammar school.

Result of the poll will determine the future policy of the Agricultral Adjustment Administration in its program of farm relief. The program as continued up to this time has been on a contract basis that expired with the 1935 crop, and the referendum will determine whether or not to continue this system with the 1936 and future crops.

Altho there has been no wheat surplus the past two years because of drought conditions in large areas in the wheat producing districts, such conditions will not continue forever. Export demand has practically vanished because of embargoes, tariffs, trade agreements, etc. It is not improbable that wheat will again be fifty cents or less if another big surplus is built up, therefore thinking farmers are determined to prevent, if possible, the recurrance of overproduction and the ruinous prices of 1932.

Horse Tramples Boy To Death

Round Lake--The tragic experience of being dragged to death under horse's hoofs by a halter rope was suffered by Floyd Larson, 14 year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Larson, Round Lake. Alto no details will ever be known Floyd was apparently leading the horse with the halter rope around his wrist, probably in a sort of half knot. The horse apparently became frightened and bolted, dragging the boy beneath its hoofs and trampling him to death. When Floyd failed to return home his father started a search, discovering the body of his son terribly mangled in a small clump of trees. Dispite the shock of the discovery. Larson managed to carry his son's body home, something like a quarter of a mile distant.

A Rabbit's Foot?

Foley--22 members of a county graveling crew thought they were lucky to find a shelter from a recent rain in a farmer's barn, and one of them certainly must have carried a rabbit's foot. As the crew was running toward the barn and only a few feet, away, lightning struck the building and it burned to the ground. The luck was scattered, however, since the crew helped Dan Connolly save the stock from the burning barn and then hauled smaller buildings to a safe distance with the big county truck.

Fishin's Good; Angler Lands Automatic Rifle

Besides getting his share of game fish on the opening day of the season, or rather the first day in which weather permitted fishing. Ernest Johnson, manager of the Mile Park near Ortonville, landed a .22 calibre automatic rifle. His line tightened as his boat drifted and in attempting to extricate his hook from what he believed to be a snag he brought to the surface a rifle with a factory date as of the year 1903. Cleaning fully half an inch of corresion from the barrel, Johnson tried the gun out and is pleased with his catch.

YOU AMERICANS

By R. H. WILKINSON

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

IT WAS mid-afternoon when Gayle Alvin dropped off the train at Juan. He was a day earlier than Don Jose Gomez expected him; hence there was no one at the station to meet the train.

The place was deserted, save for a girl.

And because the station agent was busy with the train's mail clerk, Gayle approached her with a question.

She was a pretty girl, dark and olive-skinned, having many of the characteristics, save for her exquisite beauty, that all Mexican girls possess.

"I wonder," said Gayle, "if you could direct me to the hotel? There is a hotel, I presume?"

Gayle had spoken in English, habitually, and he wondered whether or not the girl would understand.

He was, therefore, a little taken back at her remarkably precise use of the language.

"Indeed, senor, there is a hotel in Juan. And a very excellent hotel, you may be sure."

Her voice was deliciously sweet, reminding Gayle of the strumming of a guitar.

"Come, I will take you there."

Gayle picked up his bag and followed her across the dusty street and along the narrow pathway between the two rows of false-fronted buildings.

He felt a little uneasy.

He wasn't used to having girls guide him about, especially pretty girls such as the beautiful senorita, whose heels he dogged.

"It's lovely here, isn't it?" he said by way of making conversation.

She turned on him almost abruptly. "Ah, senor, you Americans do not know the real beauty of Mexico, the culture, the civilization that is here."

Gayle realized his mistake.

He saw that she had misunderstood his meaning, and was looking at him defiantly.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "I didn't intend—"

"You think we are crude," she cut in. "Crude and uncultured, savages. Oh, I know. I was educated at one of your American colleges. I am glad that you are here to see."

"But, really, I didn't mean to be rude. I'm sure the American idea is wrong. Positive, after meeting—you."

Her white teeth flashed.

"You think me beautiful, senor? But, of course. All the foolish men think me beautiful. Their love-making is most amusing."

Her frankness was startling.

"One day I shall marry," she went on, sadly it seemed. "And then all my fun will be over."

"I suppose," said Gayle, with equal frankness, "you have had many opportunities?"

"Oh, many! But these men are so stupid."

She sighed.

"I will one day marry an Americano and he will come here to live and learn to appreciate our wonderful country. But here, senor, is the hotel. I must hurry along. Adios."

"But, say. May I not see you again? This is rather abrupt, you know. Leaving me like this. May I not see you home?"

She shook her head.

"Ah, no, senor. My father would be angry with me. He does not approve of me talking to strangers."

"But how do you know I will not follow you and introduce myself to your father and ask if I may not call upon his charming daughter?"

"Because," said the girl, "I ask you not to. And you Americans are so gallant. You would not break a trust."

There was no answer to this, and Gayle stood a little awkwardly and watched the slim, young figure vanish up a side street.

Gayle was thinking deeply as he entered the hotel and engaged a room.

The town wasn't so big but what he'd probably see the girl again, and he had every intention of knowing her better.

The sight of the papers lying in the bottom of his traveling bag recalled the purpose of his visit.

He glanced at his watch. It was still only three in the afternoon.

If he hurried he could call on Don Jose before dinner, perhaps begin negotiations for the purchase of the mine.

It was close to four o'clock when Gayle rode through the gateway of Don Jose Gomez's ranchero.

The place was, he discovered, the largest and most palatial that he had seen since entering Mexico. Mere words could not describe its exquisite beauty.

Gayle dismissed his driver and strode up on the porch.

He was admitted by a pretty Mexican girl, dressed in the gay attire of the country, and ushered into the great living room.

A moment later Don Jose himself stood in the doorway.

"Ah, Mr. Alvin. A thousand pardons for not meeting your train. We understood it was tomorrow."

Gayle acknowledged the greeting with the merest of nods.

He was staring over the Don's shoulder at the slim figure in the hallway.

Don Jose saw the look and turned.

"Carlota! What are you doing there! But come in and meet our guest, Mr. Alvin, my daughter, Carlota."

By neither word nor sign did Gayle indicate that he had had the pleasure of meeting Carlota before.

He bowed graciously, conscious of a curious feeling of guilt.

She would never believe that he had not intentionally followed her.

Her opinion of Americans must assuredly have suffered.

Dinner was a rite.

Gayle, had his conscience been clear, would have enjoyed the ceremony immensely. But he felt Carlota's eyes on him, vaguely accusing, he thought.

The dim light provided by candles only served to enhance her beauty.

It was not until late in the evening, after Gayle had been persuaded by Don Jose to remain at the ranchero during his stay in Mexico, that he had an opportunity to speak to the girl alone.

They were standing on the moonlit veranda, with the great snow-capped mountain peaks dimly visible beyond the sweep of lawn.

"I suppose," said Gayle, "you'll never believe I didn't follow you. I assure you it was most unintentional."

Carlota looked at him sidewise.

"You are forgiven, senor. It is I who should ask your pardon."

Gayle looked at her askance.

"I don't believe I understand—"

She hung her head, as if faintly ashamed.

"Senor, I knew who you were from the moment you stepped from the train; knew you were to be our guest. And I talked so. . . ."

Gayle's pulse quickened.

"But, I say, that was quite all right. About—marrying an American—I mean. That is—"

Gayle turned abruptly to face her. But the girl looked at him once, smiling, and then turned and fled into the house.

Gayle looked up at the moon and breathed deeply. Life, he told himself, was strange and sweet.

Workers on Pikes Peak Uncover Spanish Weapon

A crude spear or lance left perhaps by Coronado's men, who sought fabled cities of gold, in the West long before the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock, was unearthed by workers digging on the new north slope development of Pikes peak, says a United Press Colorado Springs correspondent.

Crudely hammered out by hand, the weapon appeared to be a relic of the Sixteenth or Seventeenth century.

Cowan C. Eastham, assistant city engineer, believes it may have been hurled, or cast aside, by one of the band of intrepid Spanish explorers who, under the leadership of Vasquez de Coronado, headed northward in the 1540s from Mexico in search of the precious yellow metal.

The first person, other than American Indians, known to have seen Pikes peak was Lieut. Zebulon Montgomery Pike, who in 1808 led twenty soldiers on an exploration of the Louisiana Purchase. Historians doubt, however, that the weapon could have been left by a member of his band, because he kept an accurate record of where he went. He did not succeed in climbing the mountain, the winter snows preventing an ascent at that time.

They believe it more likely that straggling deserters from Coronado's band deposited it there. Coronado himself apparently did not see Pikes peak, because he failed to mention it in his account of his travels.

Wolves in Michigan

A peculiar understanding seems to exist about wolves that claim Michigan as their habitat, says the Detroit News. Every four-footed animal that bears any resemblance to the timber wolf is called a wolf, even though it may be a stray police dog or a western coyote. The record of kills made in the last few years proves that four-fifths of the "wolves" taken in Michigan are coyotes. Of recent years an eastern drift of the plains coyote into Michigan has been recorded, while at the same time timber wolves are gradually growing fewer. This is natural, for the timber wolf is a creature of the heavily forested country, while the coyote would naturally follow lumbering on cutover lands. It is an animal of the brush country and has found the Michigan cover much to its liking.

Statues Discarded

Statues of Napoleon III and Louis Philippe, Charles X and Louis XVIII, once proudly surveying their passing subjects from pedestials in Paris streets, now stand together, discarded, gazing at a gray wall in an ancient garden. Latter-day heroes stand in their places receiving tourist attention. In a corner, half hidden by bushes, stands the Emperor Napoleon III, arrayed in a weather-beaten dress uniform, holding the sword of power in his hand. Louis Philippe, in a Roman toga, and Louis Philippe in marshal's regalia, stand side by side, their bases deep in ivy. Louis XVIII has lost an arm and Charles X stands next to the Empress Eugenie, gazing into her eyes.—Montreal Herald.

"Snake Fumes" Kill Six

Scientists believe that "snake fumes" caused the death of six men and the blinding of a seventh near Kapurthala, India, recently. The men had set fire to a bush to rout a giant cobra and were overcome by the fumes. It is believed they inhaled poison from the burning reptile.

FIRE INSURANCE

Paying fire insurance premiums always seems like giving away money. You get no return until you have a fire. Then the amount you have paid seems small in comparison with what you receive. For your peace of mind and future security, carry adequate insurance in a reliable company. A policy in the old reliable Continental Insurance Company gives you the protection you should have. Red-Winged Blackbirds

The red-winged blackbird is considered the most abundant and most widely distributed native bird in North America. The male, with his scarlet epaulets and his cheery musical o-ka-lee song, receives a joyous welcome from the bird lover. When large flocks forage over newly planted grain fields, farmers are not so likely to give them a welcome.

'Spoiled Banana' Has Forked Tongue, Fangs

Thief River Falls--When W. L. Carlisle, manager of the Thief River Grocery Company, extended his hand last week in the warehouse to remove what appeared to be a spoiled banana from a newly received bunch, the "banana" struck out a flickering red forked tongue in his direction. A tropical snake nearly 4 feet in length and with faint diamond markings was then carefully removed with the aid of a broomstick, and was deposited in a box, later being forwarded to a Minneapolis woman who collects snakes for exhibition purposes. When warmed on a radiator in the office of the company, the snake became pugnacious and struck violently at objects brought near it. Company employees several years ago discovered another snake in a bunch of bananas, which also was captured without mishap.

POULTRY

MODEL PULLET SURE TO BE WORTH MORE

Marked Advance in Feed Is Cited as Reason.

By F. H. Branch, Extension Economist in Farm Management, Massachusetts State College.—WNU Service.

A well grown pullet in 1935 will cost about $1.50 or approximately 10 per cent more than last year. The increase over last year's costs is caused by a marked advance in feed prices and a moderate increase in labor charges.

In making calculations, it was estimated that in order to obtain 100 healthy pullets, the poultryman must buy about 250 baby chicks. About half of these will be cockerels, and some losses probably will be sustained during the brooding and rearing season. The cost of the chicks amounts to about 85 cents per pullet. Feed costs for six or seven months will amount to about 96 cents. The labor of taking care of one pullet in a flock results in about 25 cents' worth of labor being charged against each pullet. Overhead costs, including depreciation and interest on buildings and equipment amount to about 20 cents, and miscellaneous cash costs, such as fuel, litter and grit, come to about 18 cents, bringing the total cost to $1.95 for each pullet.

But a by-product of the business of raising pullets is a supply of cockerels which may be sold as broilers, and the return from broilers is a credit, in calculating the cost of raising pullets. Broilers should be worth about 45 cents each, thus reducing the cost of each pullet to $1.50.

These calculations may serve as a basis for poultrymen in computing the cost of establishing flocks this year.

Sanitary Feeding Urged by College Poultryman

Feeding grain and mash in troughs is the cleanest and most accurate method of supplying the poultry flock with their daily grain ration, says G. W. Knox, Jr., extension poultryman, University College of Agriculture, Fayetteville, Ark., and it has largely taken the place of the old mehod, both unsanitary and uncertain, of feeding it in the litter.

The grain is put morning and night into a V-shaped trough, constructed of one by six-inch material. This method is sanitary, and the exact amount of grain the hens consume can be regulated, Knox pointed out. A light feed is given in the morning, and a heavy feeding, all the hens will eat, is given at night. "Some poultrymen prefer to hopper feed their grain, keeping it before the hens at all times. This method is sanitary, but the amount of grain fed cannot be regulated as easily as in trough feeding," he says.

"The exact amount fed varies with the breed and the season of the year, and the poultryman must learn to regulate the amount of grain his birds will eat."

Ducks Are Sensitive

Ducks are far more sensitive than ordinary fowls, and mistakes in management frequently lead to a complete moult. Do not imagine that free-range ducks can secure half their living during winter months. Ducks in full lay will consume about five ounces of food daily—approximately two ounces of grain and three of wet mash. For grain use wheat, or equal weights of wheat and corn, fed in troughs in the morning, and they love to shovel it out of a trough containing a small quantity of water.—Montreal Herald.

Do Not Overcrowd

The poultryman who places too many layers in the laying house is headed for small profits and trouble. In small buildings 5 square feet of floor space should be allowed for each bird and in larger ones 3 square feet. If the birds are crowded they will be uncomfortable, competition for feed at the hoppers and for water at the fountains will be keen, they will be more susceptible to disease, and mortality is sure to be heavy. One should aim to have the laying houses not too full and not the opposite.

In the Poultry Yard

The surest way to prevent frozen combs is to provide heat during zero weather.

• • •

Turkeys, especially when kept in confinement, require ample supplies of water and grit.

• • •

Fowl paralysis did not respond to feeding treatment at the Iowa experiment station. Neither the cause nor the cure for this chicken disease is known.

• • •

Hens lay their largest eggs after having reached maturity or after becoming "hens" after their period of pullethood.

• • •

Fowl pox is more serious this winter than in previous seasons, according to reports received by the poultry department of the Ohio State university.

• • •

The rooster with swollen head and closed eye has the roup, and should not be in the flock with healthy birds, as this disease is highly contagious and cured with difficulty when present.

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar--the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself--"at home"--for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"--once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

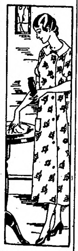
The advantage to you of spending your dollin St. Hilaire isfar greater thanthe "Tramp" dollar can buy--even if it bought a hundred cents worth--and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

The Household

By LYDIA LE BARON WALKER

THE satisfaction or having attractive housework frocks reaches farther than the woman who wears them. The effect of suitable attire, plus its becomingness, is more far-reaching. It has its influence on everyone who is of the household, and such other persons as may happen in during the morning or the working hours. It is not so far back that it is beyond the remembrance of the older generation of homemakers, when discarded afternoon or even old party dresses were made to serve more than their original purpose by being worn earlier in the day as housework frocks. This was thought to be an economy measure.



But the utter unsuitability of garment to tasks, finally won the battle between the desire to have the right working togs, and the mistaken notion of thriftiness.

Slender women, especially those who are youthful can wear smock frocks well. The stout person should avoid them. Apart from the convenience of the loose fitting one-piece smock, there is a suggestion of artistry connected with smocks and studios, that appeals. But unless the garment is becoming it does not fill its requirements. On large women the smock becomes something of a glorified Mother Hubbard, too loose, and therefore gives the impression of greater weight.

Some Good Features.

A housework dress should be sufficiently ample to permit the wearer to stoop low without straining the seams. There should be one or two pockets, preferably set-in pockets as these do not catch on knobs, etc. The sleeves should be short or elbow length, unless the wearer needs the warmth of long sleeves. So many times the long sleeves must be rolled back, that the shorter ones are preferable. Flowing sleeves are inappropriate or those wide at ends.

A figured material will not accent every slightest mark as occurs with flat colors. Wash goods should be used. Some times a summer dress that is out of style can be made over into a house frock, and sometimes the style of the dress as it is, requires very slight changes to make it appropriately serve its more mundane purpose. Whatever the requirements of a house frock may be it should have the added feature of being becoming in cut and color.

To Look Attractive.

The woman who wants to look attractive and who doesn't, has one sure means at her command. It would be used more if it could be obtained at a beauty parlor, and be paid for in dollars and cents. But this is something beyond price, yet it can be had without spending a penny. It is having a pleasant expression. This never fails to attract attention. It is the one sure way to the hearts of others. It has warmth and beauty in it. Homely features react to it. Fine features without it cannot have the same pull of attraction. The pleasant expression is a magnet. It has drawing power of attraction.

When you ride in a trolley or subway, take a look at the faces in it. How many have pleasant expressions? I have ridden in these conveyances many times when not a single face wore a pleasant expression. Some were definitely unpleasant. Some were sad, some heavy, some tired, some bold, some furtive, some curious, some indignant, but few if any that radiated sweetness or the beauty of a pleasant mind.

Upholstery

The character of upholstering fluctuates in fashion as well as the shapes and sizes of the articles of furniture the material covers. It is in part due to the variations in furniture models that the style of upholstery changes. It must conform to the necessities of the contours of the pieces. As will be apparent the word upholstery is used not to designate materials, but methods of applying them and adapting them to furniture.

Among the types of upholstering which serve well for small surfaces, and larger ones on some furniture, is the flat smooth application of the material. Chair seats and stools are commonly so upholstered and backs in which curves are absent. It is used for the outside upholstering of furniture, and for the front when the textile will not wrinkle when so applied. An advantage in this style is that a minimum of material is required.

Sunshine Room

If a floor is painted a medium chrome yellow, it will, by reflection, give white or cream painted walls a charming sunshine effect. In a room following this decorative scheme, curtains of transparent yellow gauze will help to carry out the impression of sunshine coming into the room.

Fish With Luminous Mouth

Among denizens of the sea is a fish which opens wide his large mouth, lights up the luminous organs around this mouth and waits for curious smaller fish to swim inside. There are luminous teeth, too, inside the mouth pointing inward to add a lure to a finny prey. As the bottom of the ocean is in darkness the brilliant lighting display of this fish is quite dazzling and inviting to any of the smaller creatures with a strong sense of curiosity.

Devils Island

Devils Island is located in a group of islands called the Iles du Salut, in French Guiana, off the coast of South America. Here is located a French penal station with administrative headquarters in Ile Royale, nearest the mainland. To the seaward is the Ile du Diable (Devils island), noteworthy as the prison of Alfred Dreyfus, confined there in 1894-99.

Lays Largest Eggs

The largest egg known relative to the size of the bird that produces it is that of the New Zealand kiwi. This bird, scarcely as large as an ordinary fowl, lays an egg little smaller than that of the emu, a large ostrich-like bird found in Australia. The cuckoo lays the smallest egg of any bird for its size.

E. Nelson, passenger traffic manager of that railroad, announced. Northbound service from the Twin Cities will begin on May 28, and southbound from International Falls on May 29.

Roseau—Sales of state-owned trust lands this spring reveal a marked tendency to return to the land, according to a report completed by F. A. Wildes, director of the division of lands and minerals, state department of conservation. Sales in 21 counties, chiefly in northern Minnesota, amounted to 21,920 acres, Mr. Wildes reported. Both men have admitted participation in the abduction in lengthy statements to federal agents which were introduced in evidence as part of the government case. Originally the two men were slated to take the witness stand in their own defense, but as the evidence piled up against them, they decided to throw themselves on the mercy of the court, it was said.

Tim Ensrud Is Summoned By Death

Tim Ensrud, well known and popular local resident, died shortly before noon Saturday at a Thief River Falls hospital following an operation a few days previous. News of his death came as a shock to relatives and many friends who had hoped he would survive this emergency as he had in similar ones before.

Tim Ensrud was born at St. Thomas, N. D., Feb. 15, 1888, and was 47 years, 3 months and 10 days of age. His boyhood years were spent in Dakota, and in 1901 he came here with his widowed mother and had resided here since with exception of time he served with U. S. troops in the World War.

He enlisted for service at Cavalier, N. D., September 22, 1917, and entered training at Camp Dodge, Iowa, as a private in Company C, 47th Infantry. His company left May 10, 1918, for duty in France. He took part in several engagements including that at Chateau Thiery on August 1st, 1918. In this engagement, while acting as stretcher bearer, he received a severe shrapnel wound and was left for dead on the field for many hours. Removed to a hospital, he was in such condition that it was necessary to amputate one leg. He was invalided home and was honorably discharged Aug. 2, 1919, at the U. S. Hospital at Fort Dodge, Iowa. Because of his wound, and exposure following, Tim never enjoyed good health since his discharge. He submitted to a number of operations, and also received treatments at the Veterans Hospital on other occasions. Despite physical handicap and ill health, Tim was always cheerful and pleasant. Generous to a fault, amiable

Codes Ruled Invalid

The United States Supreme Court handed down a unanimous decision Monday ruling that both the code making provisions of the NRA and the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage moratorium bill were unconstitutional. The court held that Congress had no authority to delegate to the executive branch of the government such powers as are granted in the two acts. Initial opinion is that the decision will mean extinction of the NRA.

Favor Wheat Contracts

Early reports from the poll taken Saturday among wheat growers on whether or not to continue government control of wheat production, indicates the wheat growers are in favor of continuation. In Pennington county the vote was 111 for continuation to 18 against. In Red Lake county, with two precincts missing, the vote was 90 for continuation to 9 against. The same ratio is reported from other wheat growing areas.

Mr. and Mrs. Melvin Sherva and son of Fertile motored here Sunday and spent the day with relatives here and at Hazel, returning home Sunday evening.

The County 4H One-act Play Contest will be held in the Auditorium at Thief River on June 14th. Six short plays and several musical numbers will be presented. Further details will be published later.

All who have lots at the cemetery are asked to have them raked and cleaned this week. It is especially requested that no rubbish be thrown or deposited anywhere but on places provided at rear end of the cemetery.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Otte of Cannon Falls, Mrs. R. Wallen of Minneapolis, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Peterson, Anton E. Anderson and Edwin Anderson were guests Sunday at the home of Mrs. Hilda Gigstad.

Among seven Pennington County 4H Club members who leave next week to attend the 4H Short Course at University Farm, St. Paul, is Hazel Huff of this village. The members earned trips to the Course through outstanding club work for the past three years.

Dr. Paul T. Erickson, former local man, who is now assistant surgeon at the Marine Hospital at Detroit, Mich., motored here Monday to spend a few days with his relatives in Black River community. He visited briefly with his sisters at Minneapolis while enroute here.

There will be no special observance of Decoration Day locally this year. The American Legion will place fresh flags, and probably wreaths on the graves of all veterans in all cemeteries in the county, and others will beautfy and decorate their private burial plots, but there will be no other exercises.

State board examinations are being given at the local school this week.

A meeting of the Business Mens Club was held at the club rooms Monday night.

Mr. and Mrs. Hans F. Hanson of St. Hilaire, and Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Carlson and family of Wyandotte, motored Sunday to Hendrum and Halstad and returned the same day.

The new drainage ditch from north Water street east to the river flat, is finished. With culverts in, the new ditch should provide badly needed drainage for that part of the village.

Mrs. Nickie Drees came last week from Chicago for a visit with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Ortloff, and with her little daughter who has been with her grandparents since Mrs. Dress went to Chicago to join her husband this spring.

Some complaints have been heard lately about the practice of riding bicycles on sidewalks. Rather than have trouble develop, like it did a few years ago, it would be much better if cyclists would stay on the street. A village ordinance prohibits use of walks by others than pedestrians.

Mr. and Mrs. Otto Johnson, who are on a motor trip to the west coast, postcard from Doris, Calif., that they are enjoying their trip very much. Credit Committee Holds First Meeting

The Pennington County Agricultural Advisory Credit Committee held their first regular meeting in the County Agents office at Thief River Falls May 22, 1935, at 8:00 P. M. Similar committees were recently appointed by Governor Olson, at the request of the Farm Credit Administration in all counties of the state. The Pennington County committee is composed of:

Name — Address
1. Hans Anton, St. Hilaire, Chairman
2. H. C. Woolson, Thief River Falls vice-chairman
3. Leon J. Kaliher, Thief River Falls, Secretary
4. Alfred Lundgren, Thief River Falls
5. Reynold Johnson Thief River Falls, Minnesota.

These County Agricultural Advisory Credit committees are composed of public spirited citizens who voluntarily assist in analyzing and making recommendations for an equitable settlement of difficult debtor-creditor problems among the farmers of their respective communities. No charge is made for the service. Debtors or creditors who submit their problems to such committees are assured of receiving assistance of the committee and of having their affairs handled in a confidential manner. In other states and in some counties in Minnesota where such committees have been serving the past year, they have rendered a type of service which has been very helpful to debtors and creditors and which could not have been given, in many instances, except by committes, the members of which have the confidence of the citizens of their local communities for the desires and ability to deal fairly and impartially with both sides of any problem that might come to their attention. These committees are expected to assist and not to replace other ways and means which may now be in use, for bringing about a better understanding and thereby, in many instances a peaceful settlement of debt problems to the mutual advantage of all concerned.

Control Disease; Quarantine Urged

Every Precaution Should Be Taken to Halt Spread of Infection.

By Dr. C. D. Grinnells, Dairy Investigation, N. C. Agricultural Experiment Station.
WNU Service.

Diseased animals should be quarantined to prevent the spread of infection. Quarantine not only protects the healthy animals, but it also facilitates the treatment of diseased animals.

Introducing new animals into a herd without quarantining them for a period of 30 to 40 days is not favored. If at the end of the period they are found to be free from disease, then it is considered safe to place them in the herd.

While in quarantine the animals should be watched closely for any trace of disease. The period necessary to keep the animals under close observation varies, depending upon where the new animals came from, the type of animal, and its physical condition.

Animals collected from different farms, assembled in public stock yards, and shipped long distances are dangerous sources of infection, as they are exposed to many chances for catching disease at a time when their resistance is lowered.

But animals which have been hauled only short distances are also liable to became infected, while many come from herds where disease is present, the need for precaution is necessary whenever bringing new stock into a herd.

A few infected animals can spread disease through a whole herd in a few days, and it is risky to wait a day or two before putting the new stock into quarantine, even though there is no apparent indication of disease.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Austin—The municipal water and light board announced a rate reduction for commercial and residential consumers, effective June 1.

Deer River—Six fires have been reported already on the Cut Foot Sioux district of the Chippewa National Forest, J. E. Coleman, district ranger, reports.

Tracy—Fire destroyed the old Farmers Co-operative elevator at Garvin, six miles west of here, with loss estimated at $15,000. The structure, about 35 years old, was used as a mill.

St. Paul—Arthur (Doc) Barker was convicted in federal court here of the kidnaping of Edward G. Bremer, and sentenced to life imprisonment. Four others in the gang were also found guilty and seven released.

Brainerd—Fine crops are in prospect in this north country for the celebration of Paul Bunyon Day next month. Practically every able-bodied male is supporting a crop of whiskers for the coming event.

Duluth—A photograph, showing the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln on March 4, 1861, and said to be the only one of its kind in the country, is included in a Lincoln collection owned by Norman Spindler of Duluth.

Spring Valley — "The Mystery Caves," twin caverns discovered recently near here, were opened officially in ceremonies with Spring Valley residents and visitors from several southeastern Minnesota counties attending.

St. Paul—William N. Carey, PWA state engineer for Minnesota, was appointed resident project engineer for the Minneapolis-St. Paul sanitary district's $13,774,000 federal sewage project by Works Administration, Harold L. Ickes.

Minneapolis—More than 10,000 Minnesota workers will be given employment in highway construction and grade crossing eliminatior work, as soon as contracts for the specific projects are let by the state highway department.

Minneapolis—Two bandits held up a special officer and three employees of the Great Northern railroad station and robbed them of $3,000, representing receipts of the Great Northern ticket office. The four men were on their way to the bank at the time.

St. Paul—More than 400 signed petitions from 11 midwst states and one Canadian province, advocating a closed season on ducks, have been received by the Midwest Conservation alliance in St. Paul. Saskatchewan is the Canadian province which has sent in petitions. The petitions will be forwarded to President Roosevelt.

Hallock—The Rev. Oscar O. Gustafson of Alexandria was elected president for his fourteenth term by the Red River Valley conference of Lutheran churches. Other officers chosen were the Rev. Walfred Erickson, Hallock, vice president; the Rev. Elmer Dahlgren, McIntosh, secretary, and Emil Gahlon, Alexandria, treasurer.

St. Paul—Automobile license plates for 1935 must be on all automobiles and trucks by June 1. Police and highway patrol will start a drive against cars without license plates after that time. For failing to purchase license plates by May 1, motorists must pay a penalty of 50 cents, which will be increased another 50 cents on June 4.

Hibbing—Mining companies in Hibbing will ask owners of property in North Hibbing to submit proposals to them, purchasing from those who make the best offers, according to R. W. Hitchcock, former legislator and Hibbing publisher. This will be the first step in negotiations which will lead to the purchase of North Hibbing, as authorized by the state legislature at its recent session.

Detroit Lakes—Traces of what historical experts claim to have been a terrific battle perhaps 300 years ago in which hundreds of Indians lost their lives were uncovered by the American Legion Historical Society. Excavation of an Indian burial mound—one of 20 along the north shore of Detroit Lakes—showed vestiges of the early Chippewa and Sioux tribes. Bones, skulls and jawbones with teeth well preserved and numerous trinkets were uncovered. Digging in the burial grounds is preceding highway crews building a new lakeshore road.

St. Paul—First construction in Minnesota under the new $4,880,000,000 federal work relief program will begin within six weeks, W. N. Carey, acting PWA administrator for Minnesota, reveals. Ten applications for projects that would cost approximately $1,500,000 have already been received, and others are arriving daily from communities and groups which several months ago participated in an inventory of possible construction work. The inventory showed some $265,000,000 could be spent, but only $60,000,000 of that amount is alloted to the state.

St. Paul—When the 1935 legislature exempted household goods from taxation, its action resulted in relieving owners from all taxes on diamonds and other jewelry, silver plate, art objects and like personal and household effects. So assesors have been notified. They are out now assessing personal property, but the new law relieves them of the job of ringing door bells in residence districts and interviewing housewives. The contents of homes pay no taxes, no matter how valuable.

PATRICIA turned the corner and trudged up another busy street. Never had people seemed so much like marching ants as they filed past her, nor the world itself more like a dunghill of crawling insects.

Claude, her stepfather, was waiting for her in the lobby of the Maldridge. Mother worked but Claude lived on a pension; he was gassed or something once. Patricia had just come to live with them since Aunt Margot died. Aunt Margot understood. Patricia was a sensitive child that needed encouragement and patience. Her talent needed good soil and fair weather for its growth. Aunt Margot had nourished Pat's literary seed. But Aunt Margot had died and Patricia at nineteen was left dependent on mother and Claude. Claude seemed to hold some strange power over mother. Patricia loathed him. He was heavy and almost vulgar and the once good contours of his face were flabby now. Claude thought Patricia a moon-struck fool. He had told her to get out and find a job and make her own. Mother had mildly added that it would do her no harm.

Three mornings now had she walked the streets and answered ads, and made inquiries. "Any experience?" How could one say yes? Some took her application; others would not do that. It was a strange, hateful world.

At the corner she saw a voluptuous old negress wabbling down the street. She was humming to the swaying of her rippling fat. Patricia watched her while waiting for the green light. The old black woman came up to her.

"Well, hello, honey, Miss Wilma." Pat stared at her not replying.

"I know you all think you don't know me," she went on, "but I knows you. I knows you by that pretty little dress you wearing." Patricia felt embarrassed.

"No, you don't know me. I'm . . ."

"Listen, honey, Miss Wilma, I don' fo'git no dress after I done once washed it." Pat glanced uneasily at her green pleated crepe. It was only its second wearing. The old woman was mad.

"Get out," she said hurriedly. "I'm a stranger here in town." The light was green. Patricia hurried across but the old woman was at her heels and talking loudly.

"Sho nuff. Well you and Miss Wilma jus' look so much alike, ah, honey, you don' know no one what wants a good washwoman?" Well this was technique.

"No," said Patricia kindly and quickly realized her indulgent tone was a mistake; the negress was walking abreast of her now.

"Well, yo' all couldn' put a nickel on a church calendar, could ya?"

"I'm looking for a job myself," and Pat suddenly jay-walked to shake her off, but the old negress jay-walked, too.

"Dat's right, honey, dat's right. You'll find one, too. Just depend on da good Lord . . . he makes fo' us all." Well, that was a thought. Then the old woman stopped to confab with a street cleaner and, Pat, seeing her chance, dodged down the street. It was only a little piece, however, until the old woman came calling after her.

"Lissen, chile, you done run off and pass'd up a sign in dat winda . . . you mustn' nebbah pass a sign, Miss Honey."

Despairingly, Pat looked back. "Why, sure enough, it says 'Girl Wanted,' I might go in." The old woman nodded proudly and turned back with her. Well, this was too much.

"Listen, you stay here, I'd better go by myself," she said, but just as she was about to enter the shop door the old negress caught up with her.

"I ain' gonna let you po' child go in there without no he'p," she said, opening her dilapidated purse the while. "Heah, now, this gonna he'p da good Lord do his work." She took out a rabbit's foot, and giving it three moaning kisses, handed it to the young girl. Laughingly Pat took it. What a quaint old fool, she mused, as she entered the place. Crazy as a loon, but she did give her a warm feeling inside. She saw a man standing in the back talking to a lady. Still smiling she sought him.

"I saw your sign in the window, sir."

"Oh, I forgot." But then he was staring round-eyed at the thing in her hand.

"What's that?" he said. Pat looked down and felt the heat creep over her chin and up her cheeks. She gave a silly little laugh.

"Oh, that's for good luck," she said. The man did not smile but looked a long time at her innocent young face.

"All right . . . all right . . ." he said at length gruffly. "Report in the morning. Place for a girl in the office."

The lady standing beside the manager gave a significant humph.

"I thought you wanted clerking help," she said.

"I did," he answered, "but I just hired a woman for that. I forgot to take the sign down."

"Then, why in the world did you hire this young thing for?"

"I don't know," he mused softly. "Did you see that rabbit's foot? Luella, do you remember how we tied our wedding rings to the horse shoe a full week before the wedding?"

Luella gave a snort and walked behind the counter.

"Just imagine people still believing in such charms. I didn't have the nerve to disillusion her, so young in life."

Mazatlan

Mazatlan, the Pacific port of Mexico, is set on a silvery beach shaded by coconut palms. Peaceful plazas and friendly natives help to make it one of Mexico's intriguing little cities. Back of it lies volcanoes and mountains, with strangely shaped contours, towering thousands of feet above green valleys studded with crystal lakes; vast fields of cactus, acres of corn and wheat and sugar cane; great groves of coconut palms; giant cypress trees, wide as streets, that were 6,000 years in making, and cacti stretching 20-foot talons toward the city.

Hoarhound Flavor

The genuine hoarhound of the candy store and of cough sirups derives its flavor from the common, or "white," species of the hoarhound, native to the south of Europe and oriental countries, now found wild or cultivated in many parts of the world. It is a bushy plant about a foot high, with thick stems and branches covered with whitish, or "hoary," felt, and round, or oval wrinkled leaves, pale green and downy above and woolly and white underneath, which contain a bitter principle and a volatile oil of aromatic, but not very agreeable smell.

Basket Ball

Basket ball was the result of a deliberate attempt to invent a game which would fill the same place during the winter that football and baseball fill during the other seasons. It was invented in 1891 by James Naismith while he was teaching at Springfield (Mass.) Y. M. C. A. The first cages were the tall, cone-shaped peach baskets in general merchandising use in the era. Thus the game got its name. The ball used was a soccer football.

Eliminate Parasites to Conserve Supply of Feed

Stock feed can be conserved this winter by eliminating parasites that sap the strength of the affected animals, states Dr. E. N. Stout, extension veterinarian at the Colorado agricultural college.

Not only will the elimination of parasites allow the live stock to winter through on less feed, but indigestion and colic may be prevented, Doctor Stout says.

Lice on cattle can be eliminated by dipping anytime on a sunny day. The best dip solution is nicotine sulphate. One dip will eliminate all live lice, but a second application may be made 15 days later to catch the lice hatched during the interval.

Horse bot parasites should be treated not sooner than one month after a freeze hard enough to eliminate the bot flies, as it requires a month's time for the larvae to migrate to the stomach. In addition to the bots, other intestinal parasites such as roundworms and tapeworms will be eliminated.

When Cows Chew Wood

When cows chew wood or bones and eat dirt it shows that the dairy ration is deficient in mineral matter, which should be corrected at once. Examine the ration carefully and add those feeds that are high in minerals. Legume hays, such as cowpea, soybean, clover, and alfalfa are rich in calcium and will supply a sufficient amount of this mineral for the average cow. Phosphorus is supplied by wheat bran, cottonseed meal, and soybean meal. These feeds contain about 30 per cent of this mineral. It might be well to add two pounds of a mineral mixture composed of equal parts of finely ground limestone and steamed bone meal to each 100 pounds of the concentrate ration.

Seize Poisoned Food

The careful inspectors of the federal food and drug administration continue to find shipments of fruit and vegetables which have on the surface an excess of poisonous spray residue beyond what is considered a safe limit. Among the shipments seized were 137 of apples, three of pears and 14 of cauliflower. Five consignments of pickles were confiscated because they were found to have been sweetened with saccharin instead of sugar and one shipment of imported sardines was destroyed because of the presence of lead in the food.

Farm Inventory Is Guide to Business

All Equipment and Livestock Should Be Listed for Tax Purposes.

By R. T. Burdick, Economics Department, Colorado College of Agriculture.
WNU Service.

Can you give a complete list of all the machinery, live stock, supplies and property that you own?

A complete inventory of your property will prove a valuable aid in answering this question, and in helping to plan for needed repair or replacement of equipment.

Inventories may save money, too. A complete check may show that the tax assessor has listed you for too much property. All business men need to know the facts about their equipment and holdings, and farmers are no exception.

Do you know how much feed of various kinds it takes to carry each class of live stock through the winter? If not, now is a good time to make some careful estimates. Find out just how much feed is on hand, and you can tell how much you will have to buy or may have for sale. You will have some valuable information to help you in planning ahead.

A complicated set of record books is not necessary for taking a farm inventory. The simplest form of pocket notebook is better than nothing. The inventory and other farm records and accounts can be kept in a book supplied by the college extension service. The important thing is to get the information written down, and a notebook than can be slipped in the pocket.

Farmers are urged to adopt the inventory habit and assemble information about the farm. It pays to study what you are doing, and it pays to plan ahead.

Cold Frame Is Advised for Early Vegetables

The construction of a cold frame will be a big help in the growing of early vegetables, says E. B. Morrow, extension horticulturist at North Carolina State college.

At small expense, he says, a cold frame can be prepared to protect the young vegetables until they have become comparatively hardy and until the coldest weather has passed.

The frame should be located on the southern or eastern slope of a hill, when possible, to protect it from the north winds and to give the plants the best exposure to the sunlight. Bank dirt around the northern and western sides of the frame as an additional protection.

A frame is what the name implies, Morrow says: a framework of boards over which can be spread light cloth or canvas to protect the plants from the weather. The top of the frame should be approximately 3 feet from the ground.

Seeds Stimulated by Rays

Seeds that refuse to sprout when planted can be roused from dormancy by soaking and then exposing them to the proper colored light for a short time. Only the longer wavelengths of light have this stimulating power Dr. L. H. Flint, of the United States Department of Agriculture, has found. Seeds exposed to light at the blue-violet end of the spectrum refused to germinate. Even seeds that had been given the stimulating treatment with the longer wavelengths at the red end of the spectrum and then were exposed to blue or green light would not sprout. The treated seeds need not be germinated immediately. They can be dried out and planted later.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Kicking in Harness

To prevent this dangerous habit take two straps 1½ inches wide with a good ring; have the straps long enough to buckle around the hind legs, one above the hock and one below. First buckle the ring in both straps; then take a stout rope, put a ring in the rope, and tie it around the breast of the collar so that the double will come back behind the belly-band and make the ring stay. Now take another piece of stout rope, tie in the ring on the hind leg, bring it up through ring at the belly-band and back to the other ring on the hind leg. Do not leave any slack for the horse or mule to get his feet over.—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

Winter Manuring Pays

Top-dressing the wheat crop with manure in mid-winter has increased the crop by six bushels to the acre, and clover hay 850 pounds at the Ohio experiment station, according to Robert M. Salter, agronomist. These results were on wheat that had received 300 pounds of superphosphate at seeding time. On land lacking a supply of phosphate, results would not be so good. Rate of application was four and one-half tons to the acre in making the test.

Buckwheat for Cows

Buckwheat can be used in feeding dairy cows up to 25 per cent of the grain ration, says a writer in Prairie Farmer. It has about the same protein content as a half-and-half mixture of ground ear corn and oats, while it supplies about 85 per cent as much digestible nutrients as such a mixture. If 100 pounds of buckwheat can be purchased for less than 85 per cent of the cost of 100 pounds of the corn and oats mixture, it will pay to use it, otherwise not.

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar—the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself—"at home"—for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"—once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

The advantage to you of spending your doll- in St. Hilaire is far greater than the "Tramp" dollar can buy—even if it bought a hundred cents worth—and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

End Codling Moth by Spraying Trees

Heavier Pruning Necessary During the Early Winter, Entomologist Says.

By S. C. Chandler, Assistant Entomologist, Illinois State Natural History Survey.
WNU Service.

With the codling moth as bad as it is in apple orchards, growers may have to start pruning their trees heavier this winter in order to do a more thorough job of spraying in the spring.

This may mean fewer apples, but it will mean higher quality fruit. As it is, one out of every ten apples grown in Illinois in 1934 was infested with codling moth worms. Too many growers still think only of producing the maximum number of bushels rather than harvesting quality fruit. It usually is not necessary, however, to reduce the total crop to get worm-free apples.

If the grower can answer all six of the following questions in the affirmative, he can feel that he is pruning heavily enough for effective spraying against the codling moth.

Has the tree been thinned out enough so that the man on the tower of a spray can drive the spray material through the tree?

Are there enough openings in the tree so that the ground man can get into the center and spray the inside? With large, fairly dense trees, some growers leave three or four such openings.

After the operator gets to the inside, has the tree been thinned sufficiently so that he can do a thorough job of spraying?

Have too many low-hanging branches been left on the tree? Trees twenty-five years old may have a spread of 30 feet. If the branches touch the ground or come within a foot of it, the side of the apple facing the trunk will not be hit by the spray.

Has the height of the tree been lowered as much as practicable? The top of the tree is the playground of the codling moth and infestations are usually worse there.

Have all hibernating places about the tree, such as punky, decayed wood, old knot holes, split branches and pruning tubs been removed? These are favorite "hideouts" of the moth.

Korean Lespedeza Will Supply Emergency Crop

Midwest farmers who need an emergency hay crop in 1935 may find that Korean lespedeza will fill the bill, says Dr. A. J. Pieters of the United States Department of Agriculture. Doctor Pieters advises seeding on winter wheat or with oats next spring. For a hay crop, a seeding of 25 pounds to the acre is recommended.

This authority says the crop may also be seeded alone on land that is not weedy. He recommends inoculating the seed where the crop has not been grown before. He reports a good supply of seed available.

Doctor Pieters says that where Korean lespedeza was grown in 1934 a good volunteer stand is probable, and he says that small grain may be disked in the old lespedeza and a crop of grain hay and one of lespedeza raised on the same land.

Cut Boar's Tusks

The large, sharp teeth which are found in pigs at birth are temporary tusks. So far as has been discovered, they are of no value whatever to the pig, except as a means of defense, and for that purpose they are not needed on the farm. Tusks are a nuisance, in that with them the pigs often hurt each other and very frequently lacerate the udder of the sow. For that reason, experienced hog men commonly cut these teeth close to the gums, with nippers which are made for that purpose. In removing the teeth, one should be careful not to injure the gums, since an open wound furnishes an ideal place for disease infection to take place. The proper time to remove these tusks is when the pigs are only a few days old. Certainly, they should never be left on a boar that is intended for breeding purposes.—Wallaces' Farmer.

Tanning Cow Hides

Many farmers will butcher a beef or two this winter and be confronted with the prospect of practically giving away the hide. Rather than sell cow or calf hides for a meager price, notes a writer in the Missouri Farmer, they should be used on the farm. It is not necessary to tan a hide to make it into a suitable rug, or a mat for the floor of one's automobile. Try salting down a hide, rolling it up with the salt inside for a time, or until the hide has taken enough salt to "keep" it, then roll it out and clean it and tack up to dry. When dried, cut it into a square shape for a rug, or in suitable shapes for other purposes such as a floor mat for the car. Calf hides make splendid rugs for bathroom, etc. Rugs cured up in this way will be stiff, but they make up for this in beauty.

Drouth-Resistant Plants

After searching the deserts and foothills of Russian Turkestan and most of Turkey for plants to control soil-erosion, H. L. Westover and C. R. Enlow, plant explorers of the United States Department of Agriculture, have returned after seven months with nearly 1,800 seedlings. Among them is a desert grass which, uprooted by the wind, grabs hold again when it lands. Another, a kind of sedge, is propagated only from root-cuttings.—Literary Digest.

Squirrel Guilty Of Milk Bottle Thefts

Tracy--Charges of petty larceny await a squirrel upon his capture as eye witness are ready to testestify against the defendant. A well matured squirrel recently turned robber and came nearly getting the children of the community into trouble. For a few weeks caps were torn from milk bottles at the Elmer Peterson home and a half inch of milk taken. Aggravated by what they thought was a child's trick, they spied only to catch a squirrel s'nk his teeth into the cap, tearing it off, and help himself to a good meal.

First Petroleum in Ohio

Petroleum was first found in Ohio, and it is believed in the world, in what is Noble county, by Robert McKee, an early pioneer who struck a crevice containing oil while drilling for salt water. Because of the great trouble this oil gave him in the manufacture of salt, he abandoned this well to drill others so as to obtain salt water free of oil.

POULTRY

SANITATION CHECKS CHICK COCCIDIOSIS

Trouble Starts From Eating Eggs of Parasite.

By H. C. Gauger, Instructor in Poultry Science, North Carolina State College.—WNU Service.

Although no cure has been found for chick coccidiosis, a particularly destructive disease, it may be prevented when proper sanitation steps are taken.

The parasites which cause the disease are usually present wherever there is any poultry, but older birds sometimes harbor the parasites without suffering any serious ill effects. It is the chick between four and twelve weeks of age that suffers most.

Infection starts when a chick eats the microscopic eggs of the parasite. The eggs break open in the intestines of the chicks and release myriads of living bodies which attack the mucus membranes.

Infected chicks are weak, listless, and droopy. The appetite is gone and they huddle in groups as though they are cold. There is usually a whitish, watery dropping which has a tendency to paste up the fluff around the tail.

Chicks should not be allowed to eat the parasite's eggs. The brooder houses should be kept sanitary and every precaution taken to keep the eggs from being tracked into the houses from other places.

Infected chicks should be removed immediately from the flock and killed and either burned or buried deeply. The litter and sand in brooder houses should be changed every other day or oftener. Only fresh, clean material should be used for litter.

While the chicks are in the brooder house, the runways should be prepared by spading or plowing the soil so as to turn the infected top soil under. If this is impracticable, the chicks should be restricted to a limited area which can be covered with sand or gravel, or they should be confined to an outdoor, wire-floor sun porch until ten or twelve weeks old.

Culling Hens Good Way to Get Vigorous Flock

When culling the flock keep hens that are strong, healthy, vigorous, with short, neat heads and strong beaks; hens with long, deep, rectangular bodies; hens with dusty, well worn feathers, but having a bright, healthy look; hens with large, bright eyes, active appearance, and short, well-worn toe nails; hens that molt late and those that molt rapidly—keep those in particular that molt and lay at the same time, or that do not stop laying when molting; keep the noisy, happy, friendly hens that rise early and go to roost late; vigorous hens with pale beaks and shanks, with thin pelvic bones; keep early hatched, well-grown pullets.

Cull hens that are old, or that are poor layers; cull cripples, those with broken down abdomens; cull the sick, quiet, inactive hens that loaf around on the roosts; cull the "crow heads" with long, slim heads and beaks, and those with large coarse heads with sunken eyes; cull all under-sized pullets, the early molters, the persistent sitters, and hens with bad habits such as cannibals, egg-eaters, and feather-pullers.—Missouri Farmer.

Checking Egg-Eating Habit

All sorts of disagreeable substances have been used to fill an egg shell to check egg-eating—red pepper, aloes, mustard, vinegar, etc., but without much success. Now and then a hen may be "taught a lesson," but the rule is that the psychology of hens does not grasp the idea of such punishment. They may get a dose one day and try their same egg-eating trick the next. Perhaps if one kept at it long enough the hens might see the point, but that is not practical. Possibly only one or two hens are the culprits. Yellow marks on their beaks will tell this, and those individuals can be discontinued. Otherwise the remedy is putting the nests in dark spots and gathering the eggs frequently.—Rural New-Yorker

Scaly Leg

Scaly leg of chickens is most often found with older hens. This ailment, observes a writer in the Wisconsin Agriculturist, is caused by a tiny mite and can be checked by first washing the legs in warm soapy water, then dipping them for a few seconds in kerosene. Do not leave them in the kerosene too long as it is too harsh a treatment then. Sulphur ointment is another remedy which has proved helpful, according to statements by some poultrymen.

Wild Birds Propagated

For the first time in history, prairie chickens were successfully propagated under artificial conditions at Pittsburg, Kan., last year. In previous attempts, the young birds always succumbed to disease. At the Kansas game farm, the eggs were hatched in a surgically sterilized incubator, and then carefully protected from domestic poultry disease. A diet consisting largely of grasshoppers is believed to have been a big factor in growing the young birds successfully to maturity.

Memorial Day

Governor Olson has issued a proclamation desiginating Thursday, May 30 as Memorial Day. In his proclamatin Gov. Olson states. "We should be mindful that peace has its heroes no less than war. War has long monopolized the historic scene. Marching men, flying flags and bands playing marital music have tco long absorbed attention and occupied the forefront of history.

The heroes of peace are many although for the most part their services are unheralded and unsung. The so-called common men who go down into the deep mines, dig sewers, lay roads and sidewalks, or rivit steel beams together high in the air, the so-called common men who man our factories, direct the engines and dynamos, the men who till the fields, labor in laboratories and seek to know the secrets of science are heroes--every-one.

The women too, who maintain homes, rear families, work in shops, offices and factories, and take their places as intelligent, reliable citizens in the modern world, are heroines. Upon this Memorial Day let us remember and honor not only our heroic soldiers and sailors, but heroic toilers, scientists, educators, inventors, poets, artists, writers, philanthropists and statesmen. Let us visit not only the memorials and final resting places of national heroes but of their mothers, fathers and friends. Upon this sacred day let us pay homage to the heroes of peace as well as to those of war. Above all, upon this day let every citizen make his thoughts pilgrims to the shrine of peace, to the end that war may no more take its toll of human life, nor destroy civilization itself."

Lightning Races Through Farm Home

Ely--Nature was evidently in a a playful mood last Thursday evening when lightning struck the farm home of John Bouska, 8 miles south of Ely. Entering the house via incoming electric wires the bolt, in the form of a red ball of fire, raced crazily through the entire house and crashed out of the roof. Following the electric wiring route it blew out all of the light sockets, fuses and radio tubes. Insulators were cracked to bits as occupants of the house watched the ball of fire race from room to room. Reaching the attic the bolt, jumped to a huge rafter, reducing it to splinters before bursting a hole in the roof to escape.

20 Dollar Gold Piece Lost 52 Years, Found

Green Isle--A 20 dollar gold piece which has been lost for 52 years on the Voight farm in Green Isle township was found by Alvin Voight, who lives on the farm, last week as he was discing the ground. In 1883 Henry Rabe, then owner of the farm was paid this piece of money by Charles Voight, both old pioneers, for a debt, and Mr. Rabe put the coin in his pocket while cultivating corn and lost it during the day. Search for the money was made several times, but last week it was found laying on top of the ground as bright and new looking as the day it was lost The coin bears the date of the year it was lost.

Horse's Lip Pierced By A Stray Bullet

Bertha--A stray bullet from some sportsman's gun pierced the lip of a new plow horse on the Eleanore Sahli farm two and a half miles south-west of Bertha. Ben Volkman was driving the team behind the plow, when one of the horses suddenly halted and became very nervous. Examination disclosed that the horse's lower lip near the jaw bone had a bullet wound in it big enough to thrust a finger through. Volkman stated that he had heard no gunshot at the time and apparently the bullet had traveled a considerable distance. Evidently the hunter was in a patch of woods and had shot into the air at a crow. It is thought that the shot glanced into the field where Volkman was working.

NRA IS RULED UNCONSTITUTIONAL

U. S. Abandons Code Enforcement As Supreme Court Scraps the NRA.

Washington — The administration bowed before a supreme court ruling that reduced the NRA to a scrap of paper, announcing that all measures for compulsory enforcement of codes had been abandoned, but pleading for a continued code observance. Apparently fearful of a return to unbridled competitive conditions, following a unanimous verdict of unconstitutionality from the high court, Donald R. Richberg, NRA head, discussed future steps with President Roosevelt and decided upon two actions.

In his statement, issued after the White House conference, Richberg said it would be most harmful to the general welfare if unfair competitive practices, universally recognized as such, were to be revived, and if the fair standards affecting labor were to be disregarded.

Pending the determination of what shall be done he hoped that all employers heretofore operating under approved codes and all their employes will co-operate in maintaining those standards of fair competition in commercial and labor relations which have been written into the codes with practically universal sanction, and which represent a united effort to eliminate dishonest, fraudulent trade practices and unfair competition in overworking and under-paying labor.

The decision, he said, makes all codes of fair competition unenforcible as a matter of law; and in deference to that ruling all methods of compulsory enforcement of the codes will be immediately suspended. On two specific counts the court found the sections of the national industrial recovery act unconstitutional. It held that the congress had illegally delegated its own powers to the President in authorizing him to approve and promulgate the codes. The ruling was delivered in the Schechter poultry case from New York, selected by the government to test its power to regulate wages and hours of workers through the more than 500 NRA codes of fair competition.

That general wage reductions and lengthened hours would not follow in the wake of the supreme court's destruction of NRA became evident several days after the Supreme court's decision, The National Association of Manufacturers reported that 200 big firms had posted notices to employes that no changes in wage or hour schedules was contemplated. The association's announcement followed appeals from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and numerous code authorities for maintenance of the status quo. The authorities said sizable percentages of the industries represented had agreed to do so.

Dismayed by the abrupt manner in which the court halted the new deal in mid stride, congressional chieftains ordered all major legislation held up pending study in the light of the high tribunal's pronouncements. Affected, many feared, were the social security bill, the measure for abolishment or regulation of public utility holding companies, the codes of AAA and the Wagner labor disputes bill, which bears partial White House sanction.

Senator Wagner, Democrat, New York, silent since the court's decision asserted that ruling cast no serious doubt on the validity of his measuse. The essence of the opinion, he said, was an objection to unwarranted delegation of legislative power. His bill, he added, delegated no such power but provided for a board strictly analogous to the federal trade commission and defined unfair labor practices even more precisely than the trade commission act defined unfair trade practices.

Indication that some administration leaders believe they might get legislation at this session of congress which would continue a large part of NRA while still meeting 90 per cent of supreme court objection to the old law came from an authoritative quarter.

COLORADO FLOOD TAKES 8 LIVES

Torrential Rains Swell Creeks—Colorado Springs and Villages Damaged.

Colorado Springs—Torrential spring rains sent devastating floods rolling down creeks at the eastern edge of the Rocky mountains, sweeping eight persons to their death leaving many missing and paralyzing transportation and communication. Rushing down Fountain and Monument creeks, the flood waters covered parts of the southern residential seciton of this city to a depth of eight feet.

Most of the deaths were in this vicinity. The crest on Fountain creek moved on to Pueblo, scene of a disastrous flood 15 years ago, but families were moved out of the lowlands there. The Fountain empties into the Arkansas river, which flooded in 1920. Cherry creek, which bisects Denver, was flooded by the rain. Its stage above the city was described as greater than that of two years ago, when it wrecked several bridges and caused considerable property damage in Denver.

Elbert, a small village 26 miles east of here, was struck by a water wall that moved down Kiowa creek. Dot Wetmore, a plucky telephone operator, who stuck by her post as most of the town's 300 residents fled to the hills, said she saw eight business buildings and scores of residences crumble before the torrent.

Power, gas and water facilities were restored partially to Colorado Springs as the crest of the flood passed. Highway and rail traffic to the south still was blocked by wrecked bridges and inundated roadbeds. Bridges, large and small, crumbled before the swollen streams. Firemen, police, CCC and relief forces joined in relief work and city officials reported the city would be able to take care of its homeless without outside help.

George left school with a classmate, Bruce Bowman. They parted a short distance away. No one else in the neighborhod could recall seeing the Weyerhauser boy afterwards. All effort to contact the kidnapers is being made by the frantic parents.

The Serpent's Jaws

By ARCHEY C. NEW

WNU Service.

JUDGE GROVE'S glance betrayed no sign of alarm at his visitor's ashen face and sunken eyes, portends of a malignant illness. His own pink rubicund face was wreathed in a happy smile as he rose alertly and led her to a chair.

"Well, well, Maria," he boomed cheerily, "this is indeed a happy surprise. Haven't seen you since—"

"Not since Will's funeral," she agreed wearily, tugging at a well-worn glove. "I've been living with my boy Harry, in New York the past year. After Will died, well—you see—"

The judge saw very clearly: Will Brooks—careless, happy-go-lucky Will Brooks, had died a year ago, leaving what was left of his coal business—ashes—ashes of debt—little else. No insurance.

"Then Harry lost his job," the widow droned on. "He kept worrying over me. After six months he joined the navy. He sends me all he can out of his meager pay but it isn't enough, with doctor's bills and all. I—I decided to come back here with Jenny for a while." Her voice broke and she dabbed a handkerchief at her eyes. "Judge, can't the law make a daughter support her needy mother?"

"Unfortunately," he advised her slowly, "your absence has made you a nonresident. But good gosh, Maria, surely Jennie hasn't turned you away—her own mother."

"She was furious when I went there this morning."

"Sh-h-h!" the judge soothed her, thinking fast. "Now, you listen to me. Bill Potter's still running the Potter house and he'll board you awhile for nothin'. In confidence, mind ye, he's been owin' me a bill for years, and can't pay. So we'll work part of it out in trade. I'll give you a note."

"But I can't let you—" she started to protest.

"Hush!" he scribbled furiously, then, rising, put the note in her shaking hand and helped her to her feet. "Run along now and leave everything to me. But mind, nothing of this to Jennie, understand?"

"Judge, how could you?" his secretary rebuked him gently. "You know Mr. Potter owes you nothing. Suppose she tells him—"

"Now you hush!" His eyes gleamed mischievously as he reached for his hat.

* * * * * * *

"I hear your mother's at the Potter house, Jennie." Marked cordiality masked the judge's inner feelings as he met the younger woman's querulous look. "S'pose she came back to settle your dad's estate, huh?"

"Are you trying to be funny?" she demanded sharply. "You know well he left nothing except debts," her lip curled. "I even had to share his funeral expenses."

"Seems to me," he said blandly ignoring her impertinence and waggling a long strip of paper in his hand, "that your father was cannier than you give him credit for. This list seems to prove it."

"What list is that?" she asked indifferently.

"A list of judgments," he told her smoothly. "Court judgments assigned to your dad which total the tidy sum of ninety-seven hundred and forty-nine dollars and sixty cents."

Cupidity vied with incredulity in her tone. "All that—my father's?"

"Seems so," he replied blandly. "Guess when these people were sued, your father'd step in, pay what they owed and then hold the judgments against 'em to get their coal business."

"And we're the heirs?" she asked avidly. "We get the money?"

"Easy, easy there!" admonished the judge sternly. "Your father left a will, y'know. You mother has first claim on these judgment debts if we collect 'em. Guess I'd better see her and ask if she wants me to round 'em up."

"Please, I'd rather you wouldn't just now." Her expression changed swiftly. "Dear mother, you see, is rather ill." The judge's poker face revealed nothing. "She's coming to live with me. Hadn't you better—that is—couldn't you—let them stand awhile longer? Even say nothing about them to her now? We—we're so anxious to make her last days peaceful."

"Hrumph-h! mebbe we could manage it. But won't your mother—er—need some money?"

"While I'm living?" demanded the woman dramatically. "Indeed not. Remember, she's my mother!"

"Darned if she ain't!" he agreed as if the discovery were startling. "Well, g'd-day!"

"Judge," asked his secretary, "when that poor woman was here yesterday, why didn't you tell her about all those judgments?"

"Jean, I'm reminded of King Lear. Remember? 'How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child.' That Jennie hussy reminded me of a serpent's jaws trying to gobble up those judgments."

"But you're not going to let her have them?"

"Why not?" grinned the judge. "I got 'em for her. Spent all day yesterday seein' clients of mine and gettin' 'em to dig up all the old worthless, totally uncollectible judgments they had and assign 'em with back dates to Will Brooks. They ain't even good scrap paper. Only value they've got is t' raise false hopes in a false daughter an' bring peace to her tired old mother."

Two Eggs In One

Bagley -Following the usual spring "mammoth egg" stories, comes one from Bagley that may not be about the largest egg, but having claims to being the strangest one. A member of the family started to fry eggs for breakfast recently. The egg in question was just one of a bunch and not a bit different from outside appearances. It was taken up and cracked and dropped in the pan. But it made an odd sound when it dropped, and upon investigation it was found that inside this had been another, smaller egg the size of a walnut, with a perfectly good shell.

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar--the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself--"at home"--for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"--once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

The advantage to you of spending your dollin St. Hilaire is far greater than the "Tramp" dollar can buy--even if it bought a hundred cents worth--and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

Floats Four Room House Across River

Grand Rapids--Citizens were treated to a difficult and unusual stunt when a one-story, 4 room house floated across the Prairie river at Grand Rapids in the process of being moved to a new location. F. H. Dockeray, moving contractor, was confronted with the necessary of getting the small house across the river, which is now swollen with spring rains. Rather than take a chance on the usual fords, which is running with swift waters. Dockeray fashioned a raft of water-tight oil barrels. using 45 barrels and moved. the house onto it, pulled the raft across the river with his caterpiller tractor, loaded it back on trucks, and completed the journey in the regular way.

Isle--Beeler left his Model T Ford sitting out in the farmyard recently and unprotected. When he got up in the morning he found that the poor defenseless thing had been attacked by a bear during the night, and had its seat all chewed to pieces, Earl figures that he must have dropped some peanuts down behind the cushions some time, and that the bear was after them, as he couldn't think of anything his Ford had done to offend the bear.

FARMERS FAVOR AAA

A Six to One Majority in Favor of Plan Continues as Returns Pile Up.

Washington—The six to one majority in favor of continuation of the AAA's wheat control program, which was established in early returns, is maintained as the count of votes cast by the nation's wheat farmers increased. A tabulation shows 171,828 farmers in favor of continuation, and 27,325 against. This represented more than one-third of the total vote expected in the 37 wheat states participating. Farmers who had not signed wheat reduction contracts, as well as those who were signers, took part in the voting The vote in both classifications was heavily in favor of continuation.

Although it still was mathematically possible for the uncounted ballots to bring defeat for the AAA program, no hint of such an upheaval was given in the mounting returns, and AAA officials predicted a sweeping victory for their program and a strengthening of their policies in other agricultural branches. The voting throughout the wheat states was conducted at more than 1,700 courthouses, schools, churches and stores. In a few instances, where but few farmers were eligible to sign contracts, the voting was conducted by mail.

Encouraged by returns from the referendum, administration officials began drafting new four-year benefit contracts for wheat farmers and looked with fresh confidence toward favorable congressional action on Secretary Wallace's long-delayed proposal for clarification of the AAA law.

Government Aids Illinois Jobless.

Chicago—Illinois jobless, without aid or relief for several weeks, because the legislature failed to get together on a tax plan to provide funds, had their hopes lifted by Uncle Sam. The federal government rushed to Illinois' aid and relief machinery began functioning with $5,000,000 of federal money after a stoppage of nearly a month. Food orders for nearly 500,000 persons eased the pressure as Federal Relief Administrator Harry Hopkins granted the $5,000,000 to Gov. Henry Horner in Cleveland after a conference in which Horner assured him the state would be able to pay its share of relief costs after July 1. The halt in relief activities was caused by Hopkins' refusal to release May federal funds until the state provided $3,000,000 a month.

Texarkana, Ark.—Driven from their homes in the lowlands by the rampant Red river, an estimated 300 families in Bowie and Miller counties look to the Red Cross for relief as workmen labored to strengthen levees south of Fulton . One section of the approach already has been washed away.

Father Finds Automobile Mechanic In 3-Year Old

Robbinsdahle-- Elias Iverson has a three-year old son that is going to be an auto mechanic, but his father hopes he will soon get a little better training. The small boy, watching a filling station attendant fill his father's car up with gasoline, started scratching his head and wondered why he couldn't do the old man a favor and save him a little money on the side. The next morning the small boy got out the garden hose and proceeded to re-enact the role of the filling station man, except that he used water, which looked just the same. Although Iverson appreciated the good intentions, he had to have his car pushed to town and drained before it would again run.

Brainerd-- Frances Mousseau didn't mind so much when a deer got in front of his car and smashed fenders, winshields and headlights, but when that deer kicked him in the finger and broke that member, he was ready to fight! As Frances and his brother Dave were driving north near Pequot, a deer dashed across the road in front of the car, the impact breaking windshield, fender, lights and bumper on the car. When Frances approched, the animal kicked breaking his finger. The boys called a game warden, who came and disposed of the deer, Near Baudette, however, deer are getting faster on their legs, and one doe approached beside the car of C. H. Welch while he was traveling 50 miles an hour, and raced along side for some time,

Speeds Road Program

Minnesota's program for expenditure of the federal grants for road construction will be submitted to Washington authorities in sections in order to speed up approval of the work. Faced with regulations different from those which governed previous grants, engineers of the state department have had to abandon tentative programs planned in advance.

It is stated unofficially, that the $5,000,000 federal grant for road work must be used largely on pick and shovel, hand labor projects. It is apparent none may be used for paving or other high type of improvement. Another complicating phase of the situation is that 90 per cent of labor employed must be from relief rolls. This would rule out counties having few men on relief unless workers can be transported back and forth from unemployment centers. If this cannot be done, all work apparently must be done where there are large numbers on relief.

4-H Play Contest

The annual 4-H Play Contest will be held Friday evening, June 14th, in the city auditorium at Thief River in connection with a county-wide Flag Day observance.

Roy Evenson Drowned

The body of Roy Evenson, age 23, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Evenson of Wyandotte, who had been missing since he attended a dance at Thief River Falls on Saturday night June 1st, was found Monday floating in the Red Lake river at Thief River Falls.

Just how he came to his death will probably never be known. Condition of the body when found indicates it had been in the river over a week. The young man was employed as an auto mechanic in a shop at Thief River.

Besides his parents, young Evenson is survived by four sisters and four brothers.

If enough interest is shown, an auto trip to Warroad and a boat trip on Lake of the Woods may be chosen from one of the different plans now contemplated.

Book Clubs Old

The Roxburghe club, founded in 1812, was the earliest English book club, properly so called. The Bannatyne club was originated by Scott in 1823. The Camden society (1838) began the modern method of publishing by the society rather than individual members. During the Colonial period in America there were a number of such literary associations. The earliest and most famous of these was the Junto, founded by Benjamin Franklin in 1726.

RANSOM BILLS ARE SHOWING UP

George Weyerhaeuser Released After Payment of $200,000.00.

Tacoma, Wash. — Nine-year-old George Weyerhaeuser, kidnaped and held captive for eight days, was released by the kidnapers after a payment of $200,000 in ransom money was paid over. F. Rodman Fitcomb, uncle of the boy, was intermediary and it was he who made arrangements for the ransom payment.

George was released about 4 miles from Issaquah, 25 miles northwest of here, and he made his way to the farm home of George Bonomi. Contacts were made with the police and the boy was returned to his home.

Young Weyerhaeuser was snatched by three men while on his way from school. He was tied and thrust into a trunk on a sedan, and carried to an unknown hideout.

Descriptions given police and federal men lead them to believe the job was pulled off by Alvin Karpis and his gang.

No sooner had the boy been reported safe at home than the greatest manhunt of the Pacific northwest was begun, to capture the abductors. Seattle police found the car with the trunk in which George was spirited away. It had been stolen. Police were on the trail of a car load of hard-riding suspects who lead them a merry chase through the country-side, some times at a hundred miles an hour. The suspects slipped through the police net into Oregon, but the hunt is still on. Airplanes were pressed into service in an effort to locate the gang. The federal government is leading the hunt and refuses to comment on its progress.

Government agents have distributed copies of the ransom note serial numbers to all post-offices, banks and railroad stations in an effort to catch the gang. It will be hard though, as the numbers are not in sequence, however all of them are of the "L" series, federal reserve notes. All traps remained empty of suspects after the fifth day since the boy was released. The first ransom bill was passed in eastern Oregon at Huntington, where a man about 6 foot tall purchased a ticket over the Union Pacific for Salt Lake City. Federal men predicted an early roundup of the gang.

Five Escape From "Fool-Proof" Jail

Springfield, Ill.—Police are hunting five men who escaped from Springfield's supposedly fool-proof city jail. The five, of whom four were held on federal charges, used a shower bath pipe to tear out a ventilator cover in one of the cells, crawled along pipes in the shaft to a skylight, reached the roof and then descended three stories to the ground by a rope improvised from a canvas mattress cover.

Expectant Mother Will Be Beheaded

Berlin—A 24-year-old expectant mother, convicted of the murder of her three children, must die upon the chopping block under a supreme court decision. Bonus Force in Congress Halts Fight

Washington—Bonus forces in congress decided to abandon their battle for cash payment at this session and to concentrate on a campaign with the people for enactment of the Patman inflationary bill next session. That will put the contest just before the presidential election. Some bonus supporters believe that would be good strategy.

PLAN MINNESOTA WORK

Water Conservation, Sewage Jobs and Grade Crossings Among Projects.

St. Paul—A vast public works program for the state, aggregating $200,000,000 has been mapped and is ready for submission as soon as congress and federal works officials announce rules for their completion, Gov. Floyd B. Olson announced. Financially, the state is ready to take full advantage of the federal works program, the governor said. In case legal obstacles present themselves, he will convene the legislature in special session to clear the path, he declared.

"I have always said that I would call a special session in the fall and not before unless we need it to take care of the federal works program," Governor Olson declared. He admitted that old age pension legislation would come up if and when a special session is held, but said there is no great time element involved for the pension enactment.

Meanwhile, the governor will keep in close touch with state planning board officials who have surveyed and are now compiling data on the $200,000,000 works project contemplated for Minnesota. These projects include water conservation, sewage disposal, rural electrification, municipal power plants, grade crossing elimination and highways and self-help projects, such as a community canning factory.

Fund Sought for Red River Control

Fargo, N. D.—Minnesota and the Dakotas achieved substantial progress toward the goal of a permanent water control and conservation program for the Red River of the North, which will maintain for all time the natural riches of one of the world's most fertile valleys. This took place at a meeting of officials here. A resolution was adopted calling on the governors of Minnesota and South Dakota to convey direct to Washington the request of the two states for federal money to finance the keystone project of the entire Red river control and conservation program—the building of a dam with spillways at the north end of Lake Traverse, the point where the Bois des Sioux river emerges from the lake to become the Red river of the north.

Davis Pleads Guilty to Bremer Snatch

St. Paul—Volney Davis, long sought member of the Karpis-Barker gang, and one of the men suspected in the $200,000 George Weyerhaeuser kidnaping, pleaded guilty to conspiracy in the Edward G. Bremer abduction when arraigned before Federal Judge Matthew M. Joyce in United States District Court. In custody less than 48 hours, Davis' guilty plea came as a complete surprise. He was rushed here by a private airplane from Chicago, where he was arrested. The guilty plea means life imprisonment.

He had no idea who put the money there or why. The certificates all were dated prior to 1913. Of the money $705 was in gold coin and $80 in gold certificates. The remainder was in silver coin and certificates.

Boy Frees Robin, Bird Becomes Pet

Willmar--There isn't any doubt in the mind of Earl Larcom but that birds are not only intelligent creatures but are grateful for favors. Earl did his Boy Scout good turn recently when he saw a robin caught high in a tree, hanging by one leg with the other caught by several pieces of cord It would have been impossible for the bird to free itself. He climbed into the tree and while the bird pecked away at his hand, not realizing that the boy was trying to save its life, Earl completed his task. Now the robin is grateful, and to show his appreciation is so tame that it comes up to the back porch and eats out of a little tin dish.

Colored Glass Not Recent

Colored glass is known to have been used in Egypt 3,500 years ago, but it was thought that the clear substance was not used until the time of Rome. Tell Asmar was peopled by Sumerians who are known to have handed down many things we still use. They were the first metal workers, made the first bricks, devised the calendar dividing the day into hours, and had the first written language. The story of the Garden of Eden comes from the Sumerians as does the account of Noah and the Flood.—Pathfinder Magazine.

The Congressional Medal

The Congressional Medal of Honor is the highest American award for valor; it takes two forms, an army medal and a navy medal. There were 90 awards of the medal to Americans for World war services and six medals were bestowed on the Unknown Soldiers of the allied armies.

World's Biggest Bells Are Property of Moscow

Moscow's monster bell, known as the "Tsar Kolokol," emperor of bells, weighs as much as 200 dray horses and is of such tremendous proportions that it is actually used as a chapel. There are various stories about its origin, notes a writer in Tit-Bits Magazine. One is that it was cast in 1733 by order of Empress Anne and that it remained on the earth 103 years, being finally raised in 1836 by Emperor Nicholas and placed upon a small circular wall in the Kremlin. The bell is about 19 feet high, 60 feet 9 inches in circumference, and its sides have a thickness of 2 feet.

There is also a story to the effect that it was originally hung on beams which later were destroyed by fire, causing the bell to fall and crack. Another story says that this crack occurred in the furnace and that the bell was never actually hung or rung.

The second largest bell in the world, and the largest in actual use, is said to be the one that hangs in the cathedral at Moscow and which is estimated to weigh about 125 tons. It is rung twice a year. The "Great Bell of China," in Peking, weighs about 60 tons, and there is a bell in the Monastery at Chi-On, in Kioto, Japan, which is said to weigh between 80 and 90 tons.

Origin of Chocolate Is Credited to Old Mexico

Do you know the difference between chocolate, cocoa and cacao? The tropical tree which is the source of chocolate is called the cacao, states a writer in the Detroit Free Press.

In its leathery, cucumberlike fruit are cacao pods which contain cacao beans. But when the beans are roasted and ground and much of the fat is pressed out the remaining brown substance, ground to a dry powder, is cocoa. If the fat is not pressed out, the darker substance is chocolate.

Credit for the manufacture of chocolate from the hidden seed of an obscure fruit belongs to the original inhabitants of Mexico. In 1519, when Hernando Cortez invaded that country, he discovered that the cacao tree was widely cultivated.

The natives made a drink called "chocolatl" or "cacahuatl," from which have come the names "chocolate" and "cocoa." Frothing pitchers of chocolate were served by Montezuma when he entertained Cortez.

Cowshed Church

One of the queerest churches in England is a converted cowshed at Bordon, Hants. A Colonel Rich originated the idea of holding services on Wednesdays that people of all denominations could attend, and so warm was the response that his drawing room was soon too small for the congregation. So a cowshed was fitted with central heating, electric lighting. Another strange church stands in a vineyard at Asti, Calif. It is built entirely of wine casks and was used once as a wine store. Stranger still is the smallest church in Europe, at Les Vaubelets, Guernsey, which is constructed entirely of sea-shells, stones, broken plates and glass. The ancient Rock church, at Haute Isle, France, was dug out of solid rock by the townspeople.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Sang in Feminine Voices

Up to about 1880 the singing voice of adult males was greatly disliked in Europe and consequently, writes Arthur Collani, Newark, N. J., in Collier's Weekly, male parts in choirs and opera companies were assigned to those who were able to sing in an artificial soprano through an operation which they had undergone at the beginning of their training. Even the parts of the most virile heroes in operas were sung in these high feminine voices.

Minneapolis—More than $82,000,000 was spent for relief in Minnesota between November, 1932, and April, 1935, the SERA announced. Of this amount $20,000,000 was expended under CWA from Nov. 15, 1933, to April 1, 1934. The report showed that of the $62,000,000 spent by the SERA. $45,000,000 or 73 per cent were donated by the federal government; $12,000,000 or 19 per cent by counties and local communities and $5,000,000 or 8 per cent by the state.

St. Paul—With only six inspectors and a budget of $10,000 for the next year, the state railroad and warehouse commission will undertake to enforce the new state livestock weighing and inspection law beginning July 1, Charles Munn, member of the commission, announced. Twenty agents and $35,000 are needed to enforce the law, Munn said, but the legislature failed to make necessary appropriations. The law is designed to protect livestock raisers from unscrupulous buyers.

Minneapolis—Scientific demonstrations and exhibits will play an outstanding part on the program of the eighty-second annual meeting of the Minnesota State, Medical association, June 24, 25, 26 in the auditorium. Two hours of program time each day will be devoted to practical demonstrations for small groups. Among these will be exhibits of the use of gland extracts, treatments for various ailments and injuries, and physical therapy. Well known medical men over the nation will address the convention.

St. Paul—Governor Olson's proposal for a state NRA to carry out regulations of the federal law nullified by the supreme court ran into stiff opposition from legislators in the majority group. The governor plans to convene a special session in July, but the majority leaders revealed that they will throw their strength against any proposal to regulate industry and business along NRA lines through a state agency. Such a unit, they contend, will become simply a political machine more likely to deter recovery than help it.

Juneau, Hangs on to Earth

Juneau is the capital of Alaska and is the seat of all government departments. It fairly "hangs on" to earth, for right behind it Mt. Juneau shoots up an almost perpendicular 3,500 feet.

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar—the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself—"at home"—for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"—once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

The advantage to you of spending your doll- in St. Hilaire is far greater than the "Tramp" dollar can buy—even if it bought a hundred cents worth—and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

Technicalities of Law

One of many cases in which petty technicalities of law have been carried to absurd lengths occurred in Illinois in 1919, writes Winslow Williams, Los Angeles, Calif., in Collier's Weekly. A man was indicted on 50 counts and convicted under all of them. On appeal, however, the judgment was reversed and the case remanded because, on one of the 50 papers, the defendant's name—through a typographical error—was spelled Holdberg instead of Goldberg.

Dominoes and Dice

Frank G. Menke says: "Dice are the oldest gaming instrument known to the world, with dominoes running a close second. Dice is purely a game of chance; dominoes involve skill. It is likely, therefore, that dominoes were created a short time after dice. Historians confess inability to establish the origin either of dice or dominoes. Both can be traced back practically to the dawn of each of the ancient nations."

Where Word "Tariff" Comes From

Tarifa, on the most southerly point of Spain, is an old pirate stronghold from which we derive the word tariff. The name signifies "the reckoning." Formerly the pirates levied toll from all merchant ships plying the coast. The town is a barbaric place and its houses, with barred and shuttered windows are visible from passing ships.

Thickness of Earth's Crust

The thickness of the earth's crust has been variously computed to be ten, twenty or more miles. Observations on earthquake motion, by Milne and others indicate that the rock material may extend for some thirty miles. Researches in regard to the radioactive substances present in rocks suggest that the crust is not more than fifty miles thick.

FLOODS CONTINUE IN MIDDLE WEST

Swollen Missouri and Kaw Rivers Threaten to Come Together At Full Crest.

Kansas City—Floods, already charged with more than 500 deaths and upwards of $25,000,000 damage in western states and in Meixco, rolled relently over rich regions of Kansas, Missouri and California. The raging waters spread destruction and threatened further loss of life over a widening area. The big Missouri hit new crests, passing its 1927 level and promising to equal the disastrous proportions of the flood of 1903. The smaller Kaw, carrying the tide which swept southward out of Nebraska into Kansas by way of the Republican river, raced eastward toward Kansas City—and confluence with the Missouri.

Army engineers and city officials feared the full crest of the Kaw, roaring into the Missouri, would bring flood conditions at Kansas City similar to 1908. Industrial sections were inundated then with heavy losses. The threatened portions include the stockyards, numerous industrial plants and the livestock exchange. National guardsmen, regular army men and police helped farmers and townspeople in the lowlands to higher ground in Missouri and Kansas.

Death estimates pushed toward 600, including 400 persons drowned in Mexico and more than a score in Colorado and Wyoming last week as well as victims in Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska. Damage in Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri alone was set unofficially in the neighborhood of $20,000,000.

Nearly 1,000 men fought along a 10-mile stretch to keep the rising Missouri out of the fertile St. Louis county valley where a collapse of the levee would release waters over a section of farms two miles wide and 10 miles deep. As residents of the Kaw valley moved out, taking livestock and household goods, other Kansas rivers generally were receding. Red Cross workers called the Republican river flood the worst midwestern disaster since the Mississippi river floods of 1928.

In both Missouri and Kansas, warning was given in time to prevent loss of life comparable to Nebraska's unofficial 103 dead. Kansas' toll remained at eight, Missouri's at three.

Minnesota Shivers in June Snowstorm

Warroad—The man in the straw hat felt self-conscious June 5. The season, of course, officially was on. But most of the northwest, regretfully contemplating the woolens planted away in the mothballs, buttoned topcoats tight and regarded beach facilities with a fishy eye of suspicion. Here, in northern Minnesota, school children in the morning emerged from their homes, ran back inside and donned overcoats, mufflers and all of the other fixings of winter. Then they had a snowball battle, and tried sledding. The countryside was white with snow.

Babe Ruth Released by Boston Braves

Boston—Babe Ruth and the Boston parted company in a fanfare of personalities with the club's president, Emil Fuchs. A few hours after Ruth announced he would go on the voluntary retired list, after characterizing Fuchs as a double-crosser, his employer made public the unconditional release of the Babe, player-second vice president. It has been known that Ruth and Fuchs have been at odds for some time. Ruth has no plans for the immediate future.

French Ship Makes Atlantic Record

New York—Shattering all transatlantic speed records for ships, the new French liner, Normandie steamed into New York harbor on her maiden voyage. The ship averaged 29.64 knots on the crossing, to beat the best previous time made by the Geramn ship, Bremen of 28.51. The time of the triumphant trip was four days 11 hours and 42 minutes. The greatest crowd since Lindbergh returned greeted the liner.

COAST GUARD'S JOB IN ALASKA VARIED

Service Lives Up to Motto "Always Ready."

Juneau, Alaska.—"Semper Paratus—Always Ready" motto of the United States coast guard, is most effectively carried out in the Alaska division of the service.

Guardsmen are prepared, day and night, to rush food to starving villages, administer justice in remote communities, rescue crews of ice-bound whalers or tend sick and injured at remote Eskimo outposts.

Each of the five coast guard boats cruising in and out of rocky fjords or through ice floes is a store, post office, police court, battleship and hospital, all in one.

The story of Alaska is associated closely with the coast guard, for in 1867, when Secretary of State William H. Seward bought the vast territory, it was the old cutter Lincoln that was sent to survey the new possession.

Many thrilling rescues in the far north are part of coast guard history. In 1884 the old cutter Bear saved the lives of Gen. Greeley and his men—the same general, now ninety-one, who was rewarded this spring by congress for his Arctic explorations.

Another dramatic rescue by the Bear was that of the crew of the foundered whaling ship Napoleon, in 1890. Information of the Napoleon's plight, scribbled in Eskimo on a piece of board, was passed from village to village, until it finally reached the Bear.

The coast guard brought the first reindeer to Alaska from Siberia in the '90s and under its watchful eye the Pribilof island seal herd has increased by more than ten times in the last 25 years.

One cutter will make two hasty trips to Point Barrow this summer, carrying supplies to government employees at that remote station. Two will follow the Bering sea seal herds to protect them from poachers. The others will patrol villages and aid fishermen and shipping, if needed.

Destructive

Nothing could be more subtly destructive of the intergrity of individual and social life than the attempt to educate primarily in the interests either of nation or of class.

Blood and Thunder

By R. H. WILKINSON

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

ISAIH FLEMISH was past fifty. He was fat and bald and prosperous.

He was accepted in the better circles, was, in fact, regarded as somewhat of a social lion.

He attended operas and musicales.

Occasionally he took in a stage hit or went to the movies.

In short, Isaih Flemish was not unlike forty or fifty million other Americans who are past fifty, bald and prosperous.

And, like all of the other forty or fifty million, Isaih had a weakness. It lay in the realms of literature.

That is, if blood and thunder stories can be called literature.

Isaih doted on stories of real he-men, men who carried six-shooters and handied them with uncanny skill; men who thought nothing of running a knife between the ribs of other men, men who lived by the law of might and cunning.

It is said that all great men mix blood and thunder reading with the classics.

Not that Isaih was great.

He was like great men only from a literary standpoint. And probably like the rest, Isaih's weakness was frowned upon by a socially ambitious spouse.

There was no use explaining to her that blood and thunder, to Isaih, was meat and drink to a soul that had been deprived of adventure.

As far as Mrs. Flemish was concerned, it was all a silly and uncalled for business.

Hence Isaih was forced to do his reading in private, and was forbidden to mention the extent of his literary achievements in public.

It would, Mrs. Flemish stated, ruin them socially.

He was told—and he believed it, too, that blood and thunder stories were for morons and nit-wits.

No one, he was given to understand, with an ounce of intelligence, would waste time and money buying and reading blood and thunder magazines.

As a result of this Isaih, through fear of being ridiculed, never mentioned his weakness to any of his compatriots.

His opinions and ideas regarding the great open spaces and the men who rode the range, were confined to his thoughts and secret dreams.

This, of course, was before Isaih met Buck Willard.

He was returning one day from a business trip to New York and chanced to glance over the shoulder of the man occupying the seat in front of him.

His heart leaped.

The man was perusing the contents of Isaih's favorite blood and thunder periodical.

Moreover, the particular story then being perused was written by none other than the great Buck Willard, foremost of all blood and thunder writers.

Isaih stood up and with apologies seated himself beside the stranger.

Here, he thought, was a kindred spirit, an understanding soul.

One who would listen to and appreciate the prattle that he had for years longed to pour into the ears of one who would know what he was talking about.

"I noticed," said Isaih by way of an opening, "that you are reading a story by Buck Willard. A great writer, Willard. I enjoy his stiff immensely."

"Glad to hear it," said the stranger, smiling in friendly fashion.

"I'm one of his most ardent admirers. In fact, my name is Willard. Buck Willard. I wrote this story"

Isaih's jaw sagged. He gulped. Reddened.

"You—you don't mean it! You're not Buck Willard, really?"

"None other. And no one enjoys reading my stuff better than myself. Great, I calls it."

"Say!" Isaih's eyes filled with admiration. "By George, this is a pleasure. By George! You don't know how I've followed your stories. This is an honor! Can't imagine anything I've wanted more than to meet a real he-man writer like yourself. You're good!"

Mr. Willard beamed.

"Sure, I'm good. Hope to be better some day."

"Look here, Mr. Willard," said Isaih earnestly, "mind telling me how you get material for stories? It must be interesting work."

"It isn't," said Mr. Willard. "It's drudgery. Forever plowing through encyclopedias and reading western novels and going to movies. It's drudgery, I'll tell a man."

Isaih was a little nonplussed

He couldn't quite conceive how a writer of blood-and-thunder stories could call his work drudgery.

Isaih changed the subject. "What part of the West do you come from, Mr. Willard? Arizona, I suppose? Most of your stories are laid down there. Must be a great country?"

"Don't come from the West," Mr. Willard said briefly. "Never been outside of New York state in my life. Don't want to. Like it here. Wouldn't live in the West if I was paid for it."

"But—but—you must know a lot of westerners—two-gun men?"

"Don't know any. Don't believe there are any. Far as I can make out cowboys are a dirty, ignorant lot of nincompoops who can't find anything better to do."

Mr. Willard picked up his magazine and went on reading.

Isaih hesitated.

He was bitterly disappointed, sick to his stomach, disillusioned.

He hesitated a minute, made as if to speak, changed his mind and stood up. He returned to his seat, and his glance fell on a copy of the latest issue of Western Thrills, his favorite magazine.

He had anticipated an enjoyable journey home, with two-gun artists as his dream companions.

Sight of the magazine angered him. He picked it up, flung it on the floor and slumped into his seat.

After all, he thought a man is foolish to read that sort of stuff.

Hereafter, he'd devote his time to better literature.

Read the classics, try to improve himself so that he could talk intelligently when Shakespeare or Trollope or Dickens was being discussed by his literary friends.

Isaih did not again see Buck Willard. The writer left his seat shortly after Isaih had returned to his own compartment, and disappeared.

At Bridgeport, Buck Willard alighted, even though his ticket read to Boston.

"Easier than I thought," he told himself as he hurried into the telegraph office. "Old lady ought to be satisfied."

He grabbed a blank and scribbled off the following message: "Mrs. Letty Flemish, Boston, Mass. Plan worked fine. Your husband fell for gag. Is thoroughly disgusted with Buck Willard and all blood-and-thunder stories. Will expect check by return wire. Signed, Paul Jones."

Angel Fairy Decorated Birds to Match Woods

When the world was very young and all the lovely things like trees and flowers were being made, an angel fairy was sent to paint the birds so that they should be as beautiful as the woods where they lived, observes a writer in the Montreal Herald.

So eager they all were, that a long queue had to be formed for the birds to wait their turn. The large ones came first, the little ones stood at the end of the line.

Last of all, among the small birds, was the goldfinch. Such a restless, perky little attractive fellow, too. Chirping impatiently to attract the fairy's attention, he hopped about restlessly, instead of keeping his place.

"What a lot there are to be painted before my turn comes," he thought. "I'll take a fly around while I'm waiting."

Up and up he soared on his little wings, revelling in the clear sunlight and bright blue sky. Presently he flew down again. What a lovely world it was, fresh and young and glowing with color. He was admiring the just-opened flowers and leafy trees when he suddenly remembered his own coat and flew back to the meadow. But the long queue of birds had gone. They had all been decorated, and the angel fairy was packing up his paints and palette.

The poor little goldfinch was left dowdy and plain in a beautiful world. Overcome with sorrow, he sat weeping on a branch until the fairy took pity on him.

"You were too late, through your own fault, little bird," he said. "My paints are nearly finished, but I will do what I can for you."

He still had some scraps of color left and set to work on the finch's coat with these. There was a dab of crimson for his face, a touch of blue on his head and long wing feathers, cream and yellow and soft browns for his body, and—what luck—a big splash of gold for each wing. So that is—so it is said, how the little goldfinch came by his beautiful coat.

Hail a Great Menace

Hail, the coming of which cannot be predicted, is a menace that hangs over all crops east of the Rockies, particularly in the Midwest. A hailstorm can reduce a promising field to a total loss in a few minutes. Hailstones, says Dr. W. J. Humphreys of the weather bureau, are formed in the vigorously rising air of a thunderstorm. Raindrops are blown up to a level where it is so cold that they freeze. But the ascending air is puffy, so that many of the frozen lumps must make several excursions back and forth between the levels of snow and rain. All the time they grow larger and larger by capturing snow crystals in one level and raindrops in the other, until at last they are too large to be supported by the uprushing air and fall to the ground.

Sweden Keeps Relics of Past

In preserving relics of its past, Sweden keeps not only examples of costumes and handicrafts, but whole houses, barns and mills from every part of the country. At Skansen in a 70-acre outdoor museum are buildings representing almost every development in Sweden's national life and giving one a full picture of life in former times. To preserve the illusion completely the curators have furnished the dwellings with kitchenware, furniture, hangings and wall paintings typical of each period.

Will of 1573 Must Be Read Once Every Year

There are doubtless older testaments in the vaults of the register's office, London, but none which so periodically claims public attention as that of Henry Cloker probated in 1573, which must be read at the Wren church of St. Magnus the Martyr, Lower Thames street, whenever a descendant of one of the original beneficiaries wishes to dispose of the property inherited.

In the very nature of things, notes a writer in the New York Times, the petitions for rereading have become more numerous as time has passed, so that one reading a year takes place, and at every reading, according to the terms of the will, the executors, the Worshipful Company of Coopers, and the Master and Wardens must put in an attendance.

A booklet for distribution among those interested includes a copy of the will. It shows that the equivalent of $30 was left to be spent every three years for the provision of "a fair drinking pott of silver and gilt" until there were twelve. The company must "provide some learned man to make a sermon" in the presence of the Master and Wardens, and pay him $1.50, also 24 cents for reading the will. Stated amounts were also to be paid to the Master and Wardens. But they are not in pocket by these bequests. Their shares are earmarked for the poor.

Christmas Card Takes 35 Years for Delivery

Philadelphia.—Madeline Adler posted a Christmas card to her sister Alathea Rider back in December, 1909. The card was delivered in April, 1934, but Alathea Rider is now Mrs. Alathea Hagen, wife of the traveling secretary of the Philadelphia National league baseball team.

Cancellation marks on the card show it was stamped at 9 p. m. December 23, 1909, but post office officials had no explanation of where it had been for 25 years and four months.

Neither could they explain the delay of 25 years in the delivery of an Easter card to Miss Margaret K. Loos, twenty-nine, who barely remembers the girlhood friend who lived just three doors away when she posted the card.

The postmark on the yellowed card, with the bunny picture almost worn away, was March 26, 1910. The signature on the card was "Dorothy Smith" who is now Mrs. Robert Miller and has two children of her own.

Dog Loses His Position as Cattle Driver to Doe

Riley Brook, N. B.—On a farm near here a doe has taken over the job of driving cattle to water from a farm dog. A farmer found the doe abandoned near a roadside when it still was a fawn. He raised it in his kitchen. It is now two years old.

The doe took on the job of driving the cattle herself and whenever the farm dog tries to dispute her place she charges him.

Pasteur's Service to Humanity

In 1860, Pasteur's discovery that alcoholic fermentation and the souring of milk were not chemical reactions but were due to microscopic organisms founded the science of bacteriology, says Hygiea, the Health Magazine. From his growing knowledge of microbe action he was led to the production of vaccines for the prevention and cure of diseases. This was his supreme service to humanity.

LEFT-HANDEDNESS IS BRAIN MYSTERY

Light Thrown on Phenomenon of Ambidexterity.

London.—A former deputy commissioner of London's metropolitan police once half seriously suggested that a police car should be perpetually parked before 45 Hans place—so often did Scotland Yard require the services of the man who lives there. This man, also known as the "unofficial counsel to the C. I. D.," is Sir James Crichton-Browne, author of some novels based on paradoxes of legal medicine and serious works on nervous diseases, and vice president of the Royal institution.

Just 27 years ago he concluded a lecture on "Dexterity and the Bond Sinister," at the institution with the words:

"We cannot get rid of right-or-left-handedness try how we may. To raze out the written troubles of the brain is no easy matter; to delete its deeply engraven records is a task impossible."

Expert Elucidates.

A representative of the Daily Mail having recently read a report of the lecture through and failing to grasp it entirely called at 45 Hans place, thinking to catch Sir James napping. In one way he did, for Sir James had just been celebrating his ninety-fourth birthday. In another way, he didn't, for when he left he took with him an elucidation of the lecture of 1908 which, in the Daily Mail, reads in part as follows—an epic of its sort:

"Ambidextral culture, useful enough in some specially employed persons, must on the large scale tend to confusion.

"Right-handedness is woven in the brain and so is left-handedness, and to change the pattern you must unravel the tissues. My conviction is that as regards left-handedness it is well to leave well alone.

"I am interested to note, therefore, that our London school doctors who have been investigating the teaching of left-handed children have come to the same conclusion as that at which I arrived so long ago. Their memorandum just presented lays stress on the serious danger that may result from pressure in correcting left-handedness in children when it is either natural or well established.

"There are cases of genuine and permanent ambidexterity, notably that of Lord Baden-Powell, that benefactor of his country, who is accustomed to use both hands interchangeably.

"It has never been suggested that left-handedness or ambidexterity is indicative of any mental defect or incompatible with the highest intellectual power or with genius. Leonardo da Vinci was left-handed.

"Natural left-handedness is merely a transference of power from one side to the other, and acquired ambidexterity means the special training of certain groups of muscles and their springs in the brain for certain movements. It is all a matter of cerebral organization.

Mysteries of the Brain.

"The two hemispheres of the brain are not functionally symmetrical. In a vast majority of persons the left hemisphere is the more voluntary, the right the more automatic, but there is an occasional reversal of this arrangement.

"Now the hand and arm centers are adjacent to each other and closely linked with the speech centers in the brain, and it is a significant fact observed by the London school doctors that stammering is among the nervous systems induced by ill-judged efforts to correct left-handedness in young children in whom the evolutions of the brain centers are still going on.

We have right and left-handedness everywhere. In the human subject it is well to accept it as it is, and make the best of it without attempting any futile, perhaps hazardous, transformation."

Use of Anesthetics

Very large numbers of people may be affected by a single medical discovery. Luckhardt and Carter introduced the gas, ethylene, as an anesthetic for surgical patients in 1923. The number of people who have taken it since that time now exceeds a million.

Fan Mail

By THAYER WALDO

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate.
WNU Service.

SYLVIA had heard of it before, but this was her first indulgence. She set about the thing quite blithely and quite without misgiving. For a young actress who wished to get ahead without paying the usual fee, writing fan letters to oneself was a good old Hollywood custom.

She dashed off a couple of short ones—changing ink, paper and handwriting for each, of course—and then let herself really go on the last. Fervor she gave it and imaginative scope. Indeed, when the four pages were done and she read them aloud, Sylvia was genuinely moved. This, she admitted without false modesty, had a real thump to it.

The problem of a name, though, stumped her a brief while. Obviously, just any old moniker wouldn't do here. After a few moments' fruitless cogitation she reached for the telephone directory, flipped it open at random and found herself among the Ws. Sylvia began to scan the list.

Three from the bottom on the second page she found it; Werrenrath, Franz E. The syllables intrigued her; conjured a picture of blond, broad-shouldered six feet. She gave her pen its boldest stroke and signed Franz Werrenrath to the missive which told of impassioned admiration and implored a meeting. . . .

The maid stamped that letter and put it in the post box with others at twenty past eight next morning. Sylvia reached the studio a little after ten. At exactly one-thirty two men wearing black hats and grim faces came up to where she was waiting for camera call on the "Tantalizing Tillie" set.

"Miss Sylvia Lynne, ain't'tcha?" growled the one with his hat over his left eye. She affirmed it and he said: "We're from headquarters an' we got some things to astcha. Come on in Fiberg's office."

The producer, looking weighty, was pacing his inner sanctum.

"Hello, leetle lady," he greeted; "now dun't vorry. Dese boys is jost needink your halp. Tell her, boys."

"Well, you got a mash note today," said the one whose derby rode his neck, "from a guy we been wantin' to get the goods on for three years. But he's slippery, see?—slickest forger west of Chi, an' he never leaves a trail. We ain't even got his pitcher."

"What," queried Sylvia, in a smaller voice than she'd intended; "what is his name?"

"Franz Eric Werrenrath—an' he don't bother with no aliases. But listen: he says in this letter he's dyin' to meetcha. All right; so you invite him out an' talk like you knew all about his game. We'll be listenin' but outa sight, an' prob'ly he'll spill somethin' hot. Get the idea?"

Sylvia did and it rattled her rather badly. "I won't do it!" he cried. "It's—it's unfair!"

"He's a menace t' society," said Stetson-on-the-eye. "It's y' civic dooty t' help catch him."

Fiberg and the other officer seconded it. Arguments hummed about Sylvia like a swarm of hornets. Before she could collect herself, a telephone was thrust in her hand with the urge: "There's his number; go ahead."

Hesitatingly she put receiver to ear and spoke a weak hello. The man on the other end spoke with a servant's measured accents. Relieved, Sylvia gave the invitation:" . . . and ask Mr. Werrenrath if he will do me the honor of calling at eight o'clock this evening."

It was acknowledged and she hung up. The policemen nodded and sauntered toward the door.

"Okay," said the derby-balancer; "we'll be at your place by ha' past seven. So long." . . .

They walked in at twenty-six after. With them was a dark and intense looking young man who gave the impression of never having smiled. He crossed to Sylvia where she stood by the fireplace and presented a card. She read some words and saw some seals and signatures which told that here was one Roger Dale, private detective.

"He's been tailin' Werrenrath for a client," explained one of the headquarters men. "Had the phone wires tapped an' heard your call today. Thought he'd like to come along. Where can we all hide?"

She disposed of them in closets, then spent an hour and a half that was first expectant, next dull and finally acutely boring. At last the officers flung out into the room again disgustedly.

"Aw, he ain't gonna show up," said one. "Either he smelled a trap or else he didn't care as much about comin' here as—"; he broke off glancing half-guiltily at Sylvia and added: "Anyhow, we might as well scram."

The girl turned her back on them and stood gazing into the flames. Disappointment over the outcome of this was deeper than she cared to admit. There came a numbled series of good nights; she didn't bother to respond or look around. The door clicked shut. Silence. Then a step behind her and Sylvia, startled, spun around. The dark young man was there looking at her fixedly and tearing some papers into scraps. She glanced down, saw what they were and exclaimed:

"Your credentials! Why—why are you doing that?"

His smile was surprising and pleasantly bland.

"Because," he replied, "I probably shan't need them again, and if I do, it'll be better to make out new ones. A man has to keep in practice, you know."

Japan's Armament Industries

During the Nineteenth century there were in Japan no private industries of war. Government arsenals manufactured all of the arms. After the Russian war, however, the government permitted the founding of the Japan Steel Works, which was the first and only privately owned arms factor in the country. It was capitalized at 15,000,000 yen, and a considerable block of shares was acquired by Vickers.

Meaning of Word "Hex"

The noun hex, the plural of which is hexes, is used of an individual, whether male or female, who practices witchcraft. The word is derived from the German hexe, meaning witch, wizard. The verb hex means to practice witchcraft (upon); to bewitch. Both noun and verb are localisms peculiar to the people of the United States, particularly in the Pennsylvania German districts.—Literary Digest.

Wore Fine Black Suits

John Quincy Adams and John C. Calhoun at the inauguration on March 4, 1835, wore suits of black broadcloth manufactured and presented to them by a firm of Milbury, Worcester county, Massachusetts. This cloth rivaled "the best productions of Europe, no less in their texture than in the fineness of material."

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar—the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself—"at home"—for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"—once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

The advantage to you of spending your doll- in St. Hilaire is far greater than the "Tramp" dollar can buy—even if it bought a hundred cents worth—and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

Alien Registration

The first legislation by congress regarding immigration was passed in 1864 and had for its purpose the encouragement of immigration. In 1882 the first act was passed that provided for a head tax on immigrants, the amount being 50 cents a head. This tax was increased to a dollar by the act of 1894, then to two dollars by the act of 1903, to four dollars by the act of 1907 and to eight dollars by the act of 1917. Until the law of 1882 there was no general registration of immigrants and it was not until 1891 that the federal government took entire charge of the immigration laws.

Earthworms Necessary; Render Great Service

Just how important earthworms are can be seen when it is known that without them all the fertile acres of land which produce our food would become cold, hard, and sterile. Rainwaters could not be absorbed, floods would be common, and plant life would degenerate. In short, all animal life would be in a pretty bad spot, observes a writer in Pathfinder Magazine.

These primitive bits of life, however, do not perform this great service because they are the willing slaves of all higher forms of animal life. Again nature has stepped in and "fixed" things. They are spurred on by a desire to live and preserve themselves, and their service to the world is only incidental. The chief food on their menu happens to be soil, and this they eat continuously. They burrow through the ground eating as they go, and the simple but effective digestive organs extract all the animal and vegetable matter. When the digestive process has been completed the worm moves up his burrow and evacuates the soil on the surface of the ground. In this manner, it is estimated, about 20 tons of soil to the acre are brought from below the surface and deposited on the top of the ground each year.

Checker Game Believed As Old as Civilization

When you play checkers you play a game which is probably very nearly as old as civilization itself. Checkers, like chess, is of so ancient and remote an origin that it is impossible to tell when it was first played, or, with any certainty, in what country it was devised. Checkers being the simpler game, it is perhaps even older than chess.

There are references to both games in some of the oldest literature of India, China, and other Oriental countries, so that an Oriental origin has been ascribed to them. But checkers may have been independently developed in various places. It has been found even among primitive and isolated tribes, as among the natives of the interior of New Zealand. There have been many varieties of the game, differing in the number of squares and men and in the nature of the moves, but all having the same fundamental principles.

OLD TIME WHALERS GIVE WAY TO STEAM

Modern Methods Easier, but Risk Still Remains.

Seattle, Wash.—The old whaling vessels, huge and cumbersome, carrying a nest of small boats to search out and kill the whales, as well as all necessary implements for "trying out" the blubber, have all but disappeared from the famous whalery grounds in the Bering sea. Still common in antarctic waters, they are seldom seen in waters about the Aleutian islands. In their place have come small, snub-nosed "stream whalers."

Fourteen of these modern ships are roaming the cold Bering sea. With a 200 ton gross displacement, each carries a Sven Foyn gun mounted on a high and flaring bow. No more do men row away from the motor ship in search of whales; with the modern gun and high speed, each vessel seeks out its own whales and shoots the harpoon from the bow gun.

The gun throws the harpoon, four feet in length and weighing a hundred pounds, from 30 to 40 yards. Behind the barb of the harpoon is a cap, containing a charge of explosives timed to go off three seconds after the harpoon has struck. The whales do not often run with these appliances; the "strike" is usually fatal.

Processed on Shore.

One of the great dangers of the older methods of whiling was that of fire. The blubber was "tried out," or cooked down, in great kettles carried aboard the ship. The crews turned from hunters to butchers and "cooks," and the whale was reduced to oil and whalebone aboard the ship, to the accompaniment of an unholy odor and the constant danger that one of the cooking fires might get out of control and destroy the vessel.

Under modern methods factories for processing the whales are established on shore near the whaling areas. When a whale is killed it is inflated with air and marked with a flag. After the day's catch is completed the dead are gathered up and towed to shore, where the factory carries on the oil producing processes with a much greater efficiency than was possible under the old methods.

It's Still Dangerous.

Not all the danger and the excitement has gone, though, from the actual killing of the whale. So testified Capt. Peder Oness of Kodiak, master and gun man of one of the Bering sea whalers, when he said:

"It's just as dangerous as it used to be. Nobody has an easy time standing on the deck beside the gun, in a heavy sea—and the gales are bad off the Aleutian islands. The whale zips up for as long as you can say 'scat' and you are supposed to shoot him now. That is hard to do."

But the Bering sea whalers were jubilant as they started out this year. Prices on whale oil were double what they were last year and the prospects for a large catch were good. Best quality oil is used for soap making, while sperm oil, which comes from the head cavities of certain types of whale, is used in perfumes and medicines.

Only one company, that of William Schupp, known as the "whale king of the Pacific," operates in the Pacific whaling industry. The company operates seven boats from Seattle and seven from Canadian ports. Last year they got 814 whales.

Wales Proves to Youth He's Really a Prince

Vienna.—The prince of Wales sent a magnificent toy railway and a personal card to little George Schmid, living in the Vienna Karl Marx Hof, and proved himself a prince.

When the prince of Wales was in Vienna he visited a number of workmen's apartment-houses, among them the Karl Marx Hof, the headquarters of the Socialist Schutzbund during the revolution of February, 1934. On his rounds he came to the kindergarten, in which little George, son of an unemployed man, was playing with other children.

"Get up and make your bow to the prince," the boy was told.

Little George, however, replied with the self-assurance of his five years. "This isn't a prince, for he hasn't a crown."

The heir to the British throne didn't forget the only person who doubted his identity in Vienna.

Little George believes now in the genuineness of the visitor.

The hook on his line had neatly threaded a small line guide on the other rod.

Old Age Pensions May Be Increased

With passage of the federal social security bill, it seems very probable recipients of old age pensions thurout the nation will receive an increased amount per month in the near future.

In this state where the pension act passed by the last legislature was held invalid because of an error in engrossment, it is stated the increase will apply insofar as pertaining to that part of old age pensions to be paid from federal funds. The approximate amount to be paid each person over 65 years of age on pension rolls, from federal source, is $15.00. This added to the amount now paid by counties will total about $20.00. If the state act is repassed at special or next regular session of the legislature, pensioners will receive an additional $10:00 per month, making a total of $30.00 which is considered enough to maintain the average person.

Dog And Pony Show Here Next Saturday

McCall Brothers Dog and Pony Show, reputed to be one of the best small shows travelling in this section, will be in St. Hilaire next Saturday, June 29th. The troupes of performing ponies, dogs, goats, trained monkeys and funny clowns will provide something of interest to young and old. See the bucking pony, only 38 inches high. The McCall Brothers do not claim to have the biggest show on earth, but they contend there are none better.

As the admission is only 15 and 25 cents, everyone can afford to attend. There will be a parade prior to the evening performance which starts at 8:30. Free acts and musical concert in front of the tent before the show.

New Road System

The ruling by federal authorities that 25 percent of the highway funds allocated to secondary roads in the Public Works Relief bill must be spent on truly rural roads off the trunk highway system is good news to farmers, rural mail carriers and every business man in agricultral areas. This is a significant departure from previous policy and is a recognition of farm leader's demands that rural roads be included in the highway work relief program.

While the administration plan under which these funds will be allocated and projects supervised is not yet certain, the ruling definately indicates that roads serving as rural post roads, school bus routes and primary farm-to-town roads will be included in the improvement program.

This community has several roads one being that going past the cemetery to connect with S. A. R. No. 11 that could be improved under this plan. The main thing is to work out a feasible plan and have it ready to submit as soon as the work program gets under way.

Enjoy Auto Tour

About a hundred residents of St. Hilaire and vicinity took part Tuesday in the second annual Goodwill tour sponsered by the Business Mens Club of the village. Headed by a pilot car equipped with a large bell, and a truck carrying the school band, the group of some over twenty cars left here at 8:00 Tuesday morning. Brief stops were made at Red Lake Falls, Mentor, Erskine, Mahnomen and other towns enroute to the tour's destination at Detroit Lakes. The tour received a fine welcome in all the towns visited. At Detroit Lakes, the group enjoyed a banquet dinner at the Pettibone Lodge and later visited many of the beauty spots to be found in and near that city. Return trip was made by way of Audubon and Lake Park to T. H. No. 32, then north thru Ulen, Gary, Twin Valley and Fertile. The group returned here at 8:00 P. M., tired after the long trip, but feeling amply repaid for time spent. There were no mishaps of any kind on the entire trip, and everyone had a most enjoyable time. Those who went as guests, express their appreciation to the Club for sponsering this tour.

Mrs. Anna Olson moved recently from the Westerlund house to her farm east of Thief River Falls.

Ordinarily when wheat advances a few cents, the millers jump prices of flour from 10 to 25 cents. They reason the extra cost of raw material warrents the advance. But when wheat drops from $1.40 to about eighty cents a bushel, as it has done in the past few weeks, the price of flour remains the same. Even counting the processing tax, patent flour should not sell for over $3.00 per hundred right now, according to price of wheat.

Mankato Not Safe For Prison Refuges

"This is no town to come to" remarked a 19-year old girl shortly following her arrest after escaping from the state reformatory at Shakepee. Tying bed sheets together she had lowered herself from the third floor of the institution but sprained her ankle as she dropped from the end of her improvised rope. Limping to Highway 169 she hitchhiked to Mankota arriving at the Saulpaugh hotel at 4:10 o'clock that afternoon. At that exact minute the police headquarters were receiving report of the escape from Shakepee. At 4:11 o'clock she was led into the station across the street and identified.

Only Independent Republic

The only independent republic that has existed within the present boundaries of the United States was Texas. Until 1836 it was part of Mexico, and in that year declared its independence as a republic, which existed until December 29, 1845, when it was formally annexed to the United States. An attempt by Gen. John C. Fremont and others to establish an independent Republican government in California in 1845 was not successful, and in 1846 it was officially made a territory of the United States.

Waste in War Equipment

Most of the arguments against war fail to mention the vast waste which occurs in the purchasing of war equipment and supplies. A classic example took place when America entered the World war. Although the army had only 86,000 horses, some imaginative individual placed orders for 945,000 saddles, 1,000,000 horse covers, 1,500,000 horse brushes, 2,000,000 feed bags and 2,800,000 halters.—Collier's Weekly.

The Fascinating Stowaway

By GEORGE M. HUNTER

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

DILLON, the second engineer, looked down into the defiant blue eyes of the stowaway, Isabella Johnson.

"How'd you pick the Iverson? How come? And who did do it?"

Angry that her identity had been discovered, she told reluctantly how Parry of the Blue Funnel line had shot Biles at the Anchor inn owned by her mother.

She had followed Parry into the garden and raised her hand to stop him. Being close together the gardener, the only witness, swore she fired the shot.

"I was trying to stop Parry instead of him trying to stop me." The trains and steamers were being watched so she had slunk aboard the first tramp steamer in the nearest dock and the day before been hauled on deck.

Eight bells interrupted Dillon's first talk with the stowaway.

Coming off watch he found the fourth engineer by her chair.

Angling his thumb over his shoulder, he snapped, "Gwan!"

Her eyes protested.

"Fresh kid. Say, you're looking great." He said it with a proprietary air. "Anybody else been snoopin' around?"

Her face clouded as she told about the chief engineer asking how she was to get ashore in New York.

"Aw, now don't worry."

He leaned across her chair.

"Say, let me get you out of this mess. You're a swell girl."

She glanced shyly at him as the mess bell rang.

Dillon ate silently, scowled when the engineers bet three to one the stowaway would crash the gates of the United States.

Next day when he found her distressed, the captain had hinted at deportation.

"Get that worry off your chest, Isabella.

"Here's the chief coming. So-long."

Coming off night watch, Dillon whistled outside her door.

On opening, he drew her into the darkest place on the deck and learned the chief engineer had offered to pass her off as his daughter, and take her ashore.

Dillon laughed.

"Oh, lor', Isabella, you and him would be like a tug boat and a liner. Shure, girlie, you are a first-class liner."

"Oh, it would be better than deportation," she interrupted.

"Don't borrow trouble. Let Bill see you through—"

The bridge bell clanked eight bells. He kissed her hand and hurried below.

Off watch at twelve next day, Dillon made straight for the stowaway's chair.

"Who's been botherin' now?" he demanded.

"Captain Dart says he'll need to log me. What does he mean?"

"Why, he's a square shooter. If he hasn't you in his log as a stowaway—he'll not do it."

"But I can't go back," she cried.

"All right, girlie, there's a way out."

"How? What do you mean?" she asked, puzzled.

"Say—I—I am hard boiled. Women, I've known 'em by scores. I ain't been a marryin' guy. Never thought about it till I saw you."

She drew away from him.

"Say, girlie—" He looked around and saw Captain Dart coming.

"So-long."

He gave Dart an ugly look.

Before going on watch, he slipped a note under her door asking her to meet him at midnight.

In the darkness he gained the corner below the bridge and waited.

At the sound of her footsteps, Dillon turned, reached out his hand, seized hers and pulled her to him.

"Listen, Isabella," he murmured.

She pulled back.

"Let me go."

"Isabella, girlie," his tones were soft and crooning tender.

His arms about her, she sighed as his lips found hers.

She abandoned her struggles and they stood silently for a long time.

"Do you love me that much, Isabella?"

"I guess I do," she said trembling.

"But we must forget that—this ever happened."

"Never, I'm crazy about you. Once I had a poetic guy on my watch, and he'd spout about love bein' blind. Love me and the world is mine."

"Just leave it to me—"

Footsteps coming aft, she kissed him and vanished.

He made for his room.

Dillon saw her for a moment before the quarantine doctor came aboard. "The captain says I'm to keep to my room, and Bill, he didn't write in his log that he had a stowaway."

"Savin' his face, huh!" Bill grunted.

The Iverson passed quarantine, then docked at pier 40. Captain Dart dressed for the city, called the steward, handed him twenty dollars.

"See what Miss Johnson—eh—wants in clothes. If more money than that let me know."

"Yes, sir."

"You know nothing about her."

"Very good, sir."

The steward was edging past the longshoremen thronging the deck, when the second mate gripped him by the arm. "Say, Steward," jerking his thumb over his shoulder toward the stowaway's room. "How does a fellow buy women's clothes?"

"By de color, sur."

"Color, nothin', bonehead! Size I mean. How tall is Miss Johnson?"

"Vimmen's buy dress by ze chest, round ze chests—bust inches."

"An old man like you should quit lyin'. My compliments to Miss Johnson. Ask the correct size."

The steward returned, wiping his hands on his greasy apron. "Thirty-four, sir. A black dress she vants, an' says dank you."

"All right, I'll get her a black frock. Here's a dollar for yourself. Don't go boozin' now."

Half an hour later the third mate dodged inside the cabin and called the steward out of the pantry.

"Say, that stowaway girl—what does she need most?"

"Stowaway—stowaway, sur. Oh, Miss Yohnson?"

"Yes, Miss Johnson."

"Oh, she needs shoes."

"What size?"

"I don't know, sur."

"Go ask her."

He returned breathless. "Four and de black color, sur."

At night the fourth mate hurried into the mess room, late for dinner. "Been buying something for the stowaway, Miss Johnson. Manicure set, some candy and flowers. Old Melchisedick, the steward, wouldn't let me see her. I—"

The fourth mate stood in the doorway with a paper in his hand, grinning. "Me and the other mates," he said, "Thought we might give that poor girl a lift. Tomorrow the skipper'll take her ashore and put her on the train for Chicago. He subscribed twenty dollars. The mates have made it up to fifty."

The engineer volunteered to make up the even hundred.

"Good sports," complimented the mate.

Next morning as the engineers ate breakfast, a cocky sailor's voice drifted through the window. "Did ye 'ear it. The female stowaway bolted last night! Her room smells like a blinkin' barber's shop."

The engineers walked single file to her room. Wrapping paper, empty dress, shoe and candy boxes littered the bed.

"Bet the mates bought that junk," said the third engineer.

"Sure," agreed the chief. "Mates are fools about women."

The engineers were lingering near the door, like lovers near an old sweetheart's grave after the funeral when the steward ambled up. "Dat second engineer—he runn'd away, too."

Dillon had not run far. Ht was sitting in Battery park.

She'd just spoil his life, Isabella Johnson was telling him.

"Girlie, I'd stand the spoilin'."

"Now, I'm safely ashore, forget me, Bill," she pleaded. "God knows I love you, but its best. There's the suspicion I can't explain."

"Gee, Isabella, betcha I can. When I glimpsed you on deck, I tumbled. See, I got this from the Sandy Hook pilot when he came aboard."

He spread a crumpled Liverpool Mercury out and she read:

ANCHOR INN MURDER
PARRY CONFESSES

"Oh, Bill," she gasped, clutching his arm.

"Yeah, ten minutes more an' the license man in the city hall will be doin' some business."

When Salt Pork Greased Paths to High Society

To social climbers of the 183s in Livingston county, all that was needed was a side of salt pork, and the snootiest of log cabin dwellers would welcome you to his home. Even more, he would unfailingly call upon you at yours, observes a writer in the Detroit Free Press.

But if all your larder boasted was wild turkey, venison, honey, game fish, and squab, the social heights were not for you.

This sidelight on the manner in which salt pork greased the ways to social prominence is given by a son of pioneer parents, in his record of their early struggles.

He writes that in 1837, when pork was quoted at $25 a barrel and the only way to obtain it at that price was by laborious travel to Detroit, the fortunate possessor of pork was certain to find himself unusually popular, with his neighbors casually dropping in at meal time.

Salt pork was regarded as a delicacy to tempt the most feeble appetites when anyone was ill.

But wild turkey was plebeian food. If you were too thrifty to waste time and ball and powder in hunting them, one could always be obtained for about two cents a pound or less. One sale is mentioned in which a quart of whisky, selling at 25 cents a gallon, was traded for a large gobbler.

Deer and fish could be had for the shooting or fishing. Honey trees were found frequently, and the pioneer who wanted pigeon, shot once into the nearest tree and then discarded the older birds.

Eggs of Other Nations

A favorite article on the menu of Peruvians is the egg of the cormorant, a bird which inhabits the islands off the coast of Peru. In Nicaragua the natives dig in the sands for alligator eggs which contain large yolks and are said to taste like duck eggs. Sea bird eggs form a delicacy for the Eskimos. Apparently the taste of man varies with different countries for in Mexico the eggs of certain species of flies are used in making a kind of food paste considered by the Mexicans as a great treat.—Pathfinder Magazine.

FIRE INSURANCE

Paying fire insurance premiums always seems like giving away money. You get no return until you have a fire. Then the amount you have paid seems small in comparison with what you receive. For your peace of mind and future security, carry adequate insurance in a reliable company. A policy in the old reliable Continental Insurance Company gives you the protection you should have. Operates 440 Acre Farm Without The Use Of A Horse

Sleepy Eye--Operating a farm without the aid of a single horse seems incredible, but that is just what is being done by Peter Herrstrom and his son Hjalmer's on their farm near here. The place isn't a small one, consisting of 440 acres, with 300 acres under plow. Two tractors, coupled with Hjalmer's ingenuity take the place of horses. One was made by putting special wheels on the rear of a Model A Ford and gearing it down to give more power and less speed. Hjalmer was employed until recently by an electrical firm in Chicago, and has applied his knowledge to the operation of the farm. The Ford tractor is believed by Hjalmer to be the only tractor of its kind in Brown county with four wheel brakes.

Large American Flag Problem To Court Officials

Fairmont--This city has an American Flag stored in their court-house so large that officials do not know what to with it, and they are unable to state where it came from. It is 30 feet long and 18 feet wide and stars 6 inches across the point. The caretaker was told that an old resident obtained it at the world's fair in Chicago in 1892. The flag is of good material and its colors are brighter than many which float in that business section today.

Truth for Ruth

By DAPHNE A M'VICKER

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

"GIVE me," the pretty girl in the gray tweed suit ordered, "a head lettuce beanwich with baked sands."

The waiter stared. The other girl at the table choked. The one in the gray tweed was staring with smoky violet eyes at a couple that had just entered.

"Ruth," the second girl admonished, "come back to earth. The young lady," she added turning to the waiter, "wants a head lettuce sandwich with baked beans. And, my dear, even if Clayton Chambers is over there with another woman, you mustn't lapse into spoonerisms again."

The gray tweed girl flushed scarlet.

"Oh, Joyce, did I?" she wailed. "It's my besetting sin. Whenever I get the least bit excited my words hop around into the wrong order and my initial letters turn somersaults. It's the reason I never could take dictation."

Then, seeing the significant glance from her friend at the words "get excited" she flushed rosily again. But she could not keep her eyes from the couple down the aisle and the man suddenly spied her. With an exclamation he sprang to his feet and came toward her.

"Miss Sinclair," he exclamed. "What grand luck. Would you come over to be introduced to my mother? I've so hoped you two might meet."

A moment later, looking down into the pleasant patrician face of the older woman, Ruth felt her heart jump. If he wanted her to meet his mother, it must mean something, mustn't it?

Her dream had built a little brick cottage and installed the elderly woman in a chair in a sunny living room and all but tucked a grandchild on a stool at her feet when she finally smiled back into Joyce's knowing eyes and rose to go. The other couple had left first— the man was just helping his mother into a taxi.

He spoke to the taxi driver. And all the color left Ruth's face at the overheard words. Her eyes widened in amazed incredulity. Then, to everybody's astonishment, she stepped forward.

"J—just a moment," she said. "I—I'd love to have you come to see me, Mrs. Chambers. To stay for awhile and visit my mother and me."

The woman's face was perplexed.

"That would be very nice," she said distantly. "Good afternoon, Miss Sinclair."

* * * * * * *

The telephone in the Sinclair hall was never quite silent. A romping flock of brothers and sisters all had their own calls.

For many, many days, there was no call like that.

Then finally one day there was such a call. But the voice that answered was a strange one.

"Yes?" it said. "Mr. Chambers? Why thank you, I'm so sorry but I have an engagement. Yes, tomorrow, too. Yes, every evening next week."

But on one of those evenings the engagement seemed to be with the apple tree in the garden. She was perched on one of the lower limbs, swinging her feet idly. And she slid down in vast confusion when the gate clicked.

"Mr. Chambers—"

"In person," he answered, unsmiling. "Miss Sinclair, I had to see you. I just located your house this evening—I had been looking for you on this street in town; I didn't know you lived in a suburb. I know you don't want to see me but I talked to your friend and she says she's sure there's some misunderstanding."

Purple twilight was laying a soft curtain about the wide yards and pleasant vistas of the little suburb. It reflected in Ruth's dreamy eyes.

"But why did you wait so long before calling?"

The man flushed. "It's an asinine thing to say—but I was a little surprised at your being so enthusiastic over my mother—on such short acquaintance."

Ruth nodded. "You thought I was chasing you? And when you found I didn't want to see you, you thought it was a better game than you'd supposed? Well—" She whirled to look directly at him. "Well, I didn't like what I heard you say to the taxi driver. You spend money very freely, Mr. Chambers. You have the name of being a very successful business man. So I was a little surprised to hear you tell the driver to take your mother to the Old Ladies' Home. That was why I asked her out—a foolish gesture, but I made it."

Clayton Chambers stood still, his face a blur of astonishment. Then he suddenly gave a roar of laughter. He seized Ruth by the arm and led her to the street. He pointed at a sign in the window of the white house next door.

"What does that say?"

Ruth stammered a little. "Tombs for Rurists—"

The arm went on around her.

"You little nut! Your friend told me about that way you have of tangling up your sentences. 'Tombs for Rurists', indeed! I didn't know you could even hear cockeyed. My mother has not lived in the city for some years. The taxi driver is an old employee of ours. And what I said was this—" He shook her a little. "Now listen carefully. 'Jones,' I said, 'take her to the lady's Old Home.'"

* * * * * * *

"Ruth," her sister's voice demanded a moment later, "what is that man doing?"

Ruth's answer was prompt.

"Missing Key," she said, dimpling.

Fifty Million Dollar Instrument Sets Record

Detroit Lakes--Large instruments and large investments go together, and one of these instruments which was one of the largest and most heavily financed ever recorded in Becker County was recently reported. This is a Trustees Mortgage and Trust Deed given by Swift and Company to the First National Bank of Chicago in the sum of $50,000,000 and it carried revenue stamps in the sum of $43,000 The instrument is preparatory to the floation of a bond issue of that amount, and the law require that it be filed in every county in the United States where the company owns property or branch houses such as the one in Detroit Lakes. It consists of 237 pages of text matter and its transcription occupies more than 20 pages of typewritten matter, closly spaced, and on both sides of the register of deeds record.

DON'T LET YOUR $$ BECOME A 'TRAMP'

There is a big difference in Dollars.

There is the "Tramp" dollar--the dollar that is spent away from home. Then there is the "Home" dollar with its "home" circulation, "home" benefits and "home" profits.

Though both of these dollars are marked "One Hundred Cents" the "home" dollar continues to multiply itself--"at home"--for community interests are mutual. Not so with the "tramp dollar"--once spent it is gone forever.

The success of St. Hilaire and its surrounding territory contributes to the success of everybody in it. A prosperous town rests on the individual prosperity.

The advantage to you of spending your doll in St. Hilaire isfar greater thanthe "Tramp" dollar can buy--even if it bought a hundred cents worth--and which it cannot possibly do, because the other fellow in the out-of-town field must make a profit.

There is big truth in this, worthy of your serious thought. It pays to trade at home with your "home" dollar.

Man's Size Changes

Some individuals are shorter in the evening because the little cartileges between the vertebrae of the spinal column diminish in size during the day, due to the weight or pressure that is upon them. In some individuals the difference in height between day and night may be as much as one-fourth to one-half an inch.

Old Rocker Distinctly an American Invention

There is one style of chair that is thoroughly American—the rocker, asserts a writer in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. For a long time furniture men credited Benjamin Franklin with having invented it, until some one dug up a bill for "rebottoming a rocking chair" thirteen years prior to the existence of the Franklin chair.

The rocker was introduced into Europe from the United States in 1840.

Curiously enough rockers were quite the thing in theater boxes 75 years ago. Lincoln was seated in a rocker the night he was assassinated at Ford's theater. The style of rocker was thereafter copied and known as the Lincoln rocker.

While the rocker has gone out of style more or less, the Colonial rocker is still being manufactured.

Mrs. Torstveit Called

Mrs. Marthe Torstveit, respected resident of Rocksbury township for over forty years, died at her home last Saturday, June 29, at the age of 66 years, after an illness of nearly two years.

Mrs. Torstveit, who parents were Johannes and Mathea Skjerva, was born in Norway the 28th day of July, 1869. Funeral services will be conducted today (Wednesday) at 2:00 p. m. at the St. Pauli Lutheran church of which she had been a member since it was organized. Rev. M. L. Dahle will officiate at the service and interment will be in the family plot in the cemetery west of that church.

A heavy rain fell over this section this afternoon bringing the moisture needed to carry forward the crops. Some hail fell with the rain but as there was but little wind, it is not believed the hail caused any damage.

Win From Goodridge

In contrast to a game played at Goodridge the previous Sunday when they lost by a margin of two scores, the St. Hilaire ball team met and defeated Goodridge on local grounds last Sunday by a score of 10 to 8. Norman Holmes on the mound for St. Hilaire, allowed but few hits and did splended work thruout the game. Vernon Lindquist drafted for the receiving end when Loyd Johnson was unable to play, gave a good account of himself. Excepting for a few errors, the home battery received fine support from their team mates.

Goodridge too, had some heavy sluggers on its lineup, and it was nobody's game until the final frame. In the visitor's half of the last inning, they had two men in scoring position with two men out. The batter drove a nice fly ball into center field which looked good for two bases, but Reiersgord came under it and retired the side with the score standing 10 to 8.

Ice Cream Social

The St. Hilaire 4H Club will have a Band Concert and Ice Cream Social this coming Saturday evening. The Concert and Social will be played and served somewhere in the business section of the city. Everybody welcome.

Aas had attended the fiftieth anniversary celebration of a church he served years ago at Newfolden.

A big delegation from here, including the band, is going to celebrate the Fourth at Red Lake Falls.

Regular monthly meeting of the village council was held at the village building Monday night.

Dog And Pony Show

McCall Brothers pitched their tent Saturday on the lots south of the Satterberg machinery building and that evening gave a fine performance featuring their trained ponies, goats, dogs, monkeys and bear. Some of the feats performed by the educated horse were almost uncanny and performance by the ponies and dog showed long and careful training. McCall Bros put on a good show, and all who saw it here were well pleased.

Witness Pageant

Several people from this community motored Sunday to Itasca State Park to witness presentation of the 1935 historical pageant which was given for the first time this season. A heavy downpour of rain as the pageant was about to close, drenched several thousands of spectators who were on the grounds. Mr. Dahle is one of the old pioneers of this section, having resided in the county for 48 years. During mill days he was employed at the refuse burner at the sawmill.

H. L. Fowler Resigns

Harry L. Fowler, serving his second term as Auditor of Pennington county, handed in his resigination to the county board last week following discovery of alleged irregularity in his accounts and misappropriation of county funds. While the amount claimed to have been illegally appropriated is reported to be small, the laws governing in such cases are very strict and it is the usual procedure for an official to resign. Mr. Fowler, it is said, is making every effort toward restitution. As the auditor, as well as other county officers, furnish bond to insure faithful performance of their duties upon taking office, the county will suffer no loss.

Mr. Fowler was first appointed to the office in 1929 and was elected in 1930 for a four year team. Last fall he was re elected by one of the largest votes ever given an official in this county.

A. M. Senstad, who had been city assessor at Thief River Falls was appointed by the board to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Fowler, and is now in charge of the office.

George Biskey, Sr., was taken again Saturday to the hospital at Thief River after suffering an acute attack of asthma. He is reported to be showing a little improvment this week.

Romanoff Has Modest Home Near Pittsburgh

Pittsburgh.—Gregory Romanoff cherishes no delusions of the grandeur he and his wife once knew.

The son of an officer in the czar's imperial army, reconciled to the loss of his ancestral estate in Russia, he has received his first naturalization papers.

With his wife and four daughters, Romanoff lives in a modest four-room dwelling in the nearby borough of Homestead, and ekes out an even more modest living by teaching Russian at church schools and directing choral groups.

Of necessity, the daughters will be denied the advantages of luxury and of education in exclusive seminaries such as their parents knew in an Ukrainian province years ago.

Romanoff makes no pretense of royal lineage, althought he traces the family name to Alexander the Third. His father once was asked by the czar to change his name in order that "Romanoff" might be reserved for the royal family. But his father declined, even though a handsome cash settlement was offered.

When rumblings of the revolution broke upon the Russian scene, Romanoff and his bride fled by different routes to Canada. Their wistful hope some day to reclaim their home vanished with the Soviet rise to power, and they settled here.

Popular Gordon Setter Always Gentleman's Dog

There is little question that the Gordon, like all setters, comes of very old stock, writes Frank F. Dole in the New York Herald-Tribune. His markings would seem to show that he was one of the early varieties in England. He is marked exactly like the black and tan terrier and as were some of the old setting spaniels from which setters were produced. As in the terrier, the markings of the Gordon are closely defined and there is no suggestion of a running over of colors.

The Gordon setter has always been a gentleman's dog. He takes his name from a British nobleman, who, although not the founder of the breed, had much to do with its early development. This was the duke of Gordon, who lived at the beginning of the Nineteenth century.

The Gordon is a heavier dog than the English or Irish setter, and makes up in strength what he may lack in speed. It is true that the Gordon does not work rapidly enough to do much in field trials. The English and Irish setters, being lighter dogs, cover the ground more rapidly and where speed counts and the number of coveys flushed means everything, the Gordon is forced to take second place.

As an all-round good hunting dog, a beautiful animal and a loyal pal, there is none that surpasses the black and tan Gordon setter.

Central-Heated Britain Result of Gulf Stream

The famous Gulf stream, which makes the British isles temperate when they ought to be sub-Arctic, is an ocean river, says a writer in Tit-Bits Magazine. It keeps one-quarter of the water of the North Atlantic on the move, and is computed to pour 436 billion tons of water past Florida daily. The difference of temperature between the stream and the adjacent water, even as far from its source in the Caribbean sea as Newfoundland, is 30 degrees, and the color is indigo blue. Its maximum speed of flow is four miles an hour. The cause of this flow is probably the difference in density, the stream water being much heavier by reason of excessive saltiness, consequent upon tropical evaporation. Its direction is determined by the narrow passage it has to negotiate in escaping from the gulf of Mexico. Its effect in tempering our climate is best illustrated by the fact that the coldest place in the world, where the thermometer is commonly 80 degrees below zero, in eastern Siberia, is in the same latitude as the Orkneys.

Modern Mother

JEANNETTE was washing the kitchen window when she saw the roadster turn into the drive next door. Jimsy's tricycle was on the driveway. She ran out quickly and grabbed it up.

The roadster had stopped. A young man was alighting. He grinned and called out, "Thanks, but you needn't have bothered."

Jeannette gave an answering smile as she pushed her tumbled hair back from her face.

She was wishing she had powdered her nose.

"This moving business and trying to keep up with a boy of three—" she began.

"Is something else I can well imagine," he interrupted.

The tanned face that was undeniably handsome broke up into patchy twinklings. Brown eyes assured understanding.

"Are you settled?"

"N-no, not all, of course—"

A scream rent the air.

Jeannette cried, "It's Jimsy!" and ran toward the garage whence the sound seemed to emanate.

The young man followed.

Halfway up the inside of the garage hanging perilously to a wobbly board that had pulled loose at one end, was Jimsy.

"Aunty Nette, I'se falling!"

"Hold tight. I'll get you, darling."

But big masculine arms helped Jimsy down.

"Thank you, so much, Mr.—" Jeannette hesitated.

"Cameron. George Cameron. Your next door neighbor."

"And I'm—"

But Jeannette had no time for more.

"Jimsy!"

The youngster had tripped on a can of paint and was sprawled in a pool of vermilion lacquer. His eyes were enormous.

"I'se bleeding, Aunty Nette!"

"No Jimsy, it's paint. And gracious! What a mess!"

George whistled. He picked Jimsy up gingerly and stood him away from the pool of paint. His eyes were turning somersaults of merriment as they met Jeonette's.

"Looks as if you had a job on your hands."

"Rather!"

Jeannette's eyes danced as they watched the young man's mouth curl with laughter.

"Say, your nose crinkles when you laugh," he announced approvingly.

They laughed together then forgetful of Jimsy.

George walked into the house the back way.

He was thinking.

"Antoinette, eh? One of these modern mothers. Lets her son call her by her first name. Well, a darned cute one."

His eyes sobered.

He thought of her all through the day.

Jeannette was undressing Jimsy that evening when the telephone rang. "It's a girl," said Bob's tired husky voice.

"Oh Bob, that's great. How's Marie?"

"All right, they say. Anyway I'm staying awhile. I'll be home later."

Jeannette swallowed a lump in her throat.

"Jimsy," she said, "you've a new baby sister. Your daddy just called."

She smiled and hugged him, but tears came to her eyes.

She suddenly remembered the young man next door. George.

The next afternoon Jeannette and Jimsy were in the back yard when George drove up again.

Jimsy went tearing across to the car on his tricycle. He hit a bump and fell in a heap and began to cry lustily.

George retrieved the tricycle and Jimsy and handed the latter over to Jeannette.

"He seems to have a flair for it," he told her, grinning.

Jeannette dried the little fellow's tears and told him to play with his wheelbarrow a while but Jimsy wanted only his tricycle. He got on it and soon had tumbled again.

"Bull-headed, eh?" George teased her.

"No, plucky," Jeannette said mischievously.

"Just like his daddy."

"Oh-h I see," George said but he was thinking, "The lucky bum!"

Jimsy came up and pulled George toward the car.

"Take me a ride," he begged.

"O. K., little man. I'm just going up to the next town. Five miles. I'll be glad to take you if—"

His eyes met Jeannette's.

"Say, why couldn't you go, too? We'd be back by five."

"I'd love it. Just so I'm back in time to fix Bob's supper."

George thought as he opened the door for them to get in:

"If Thalia had been like this—caring about a home, a baby, supper—"

The ride was stimulating. Jimsy pointed and chattered. Jeannette and George talked, laughed, fell silent. But the silences were pleasant, too.

"I'm taking you to see my new house. It's just finished. They're putting on the last lock today."

"A new house? How lovely! And it's really yours?"

"Yes. Mine."

"You—you must be going to get married," Jeannette said finding a little catch in her throat as she said it.

"I thought I was but it seems that I'm not."

George spoke without hesitation.

"Oh, I'm sorry," Jeannette said in a tiny voice feeling her heart leap with joy.

They explored the house to its last lovely detail. As they stood in front of the fireplace Jeannette said slowly, softly, "I'd love a little home like this."

A crash came from the kitchen.

"Jimsy!"

They ran out together to find him all mixed up with a stepladder on the kitchen floor. There was a big knot on his forehead.

"I want my mamma," he yelled.

"Aunt Nette's got you, darling."

"No, no. I want my mamma!" he insisted.

George's mouth snapped open.

"You aren't his mother?" he shouted. His intense brown eyes were demanding an answer as if it were very important.

Jeannette was mystified.

"Why, no! You didn't think—?"

"Of course I did. I've a notion to spank you."

George took her arm; pulled her toward him.

"I supposed of course you knew. His mother's in the hospital with a new baby. I'm her sister."

The rest was smothered against a tweed shoulder.

"I won't ask for more than a hug—yet—" George said close to her ear.

But he helped himself to more than one.

Peruvian Mummies Are Shown at Field Museum

An exhibit of so-called "mummies" and reproductions of two opened graves of ancient Peru are shown in the hall of Central and South American archeology at Field Museum of Natural History.

The mummies, which differ greatly from those of Egypt, are more exactly described as desiccated bodies. These were packed in bundles, which were found buried at a depth of several feet in the famous necropolis, or burying ground, of Ancon, Peru.

Two of the mummy packs have been opened, revealing the bodies inside. They are in a good state of preservation, due, according to J. Eric Thompson, assistant curator of Central and South American archeology, to the extreme aridity of the coastal plains of Peru.

The majority of Peruvian mummies were not artificially preserved, but in some cases the bodies were eviscerated, while in others resin was applied as a preservative.

The graves which have been reproduced date to the period about A. D. 1250. One contains three mummy bundles, apparently two women and a small child. The sex of the two adults is indicated by women's work baskets which were buried with them and which appear among the contents of the grave as now exhibited. Bags of cocoa leaves, which the ancient Peruvians chewed as a stimulant; silver ornaments, spindles and other objects are also included in the grave.

The second grave was covered by a roof two feet below the surface of the ground. This was elaborately constructed and is among the best preserved found at Ancon. This roof, shown in the exhibit, consisted of three inches of hard white clay, beneath which were a layer of plant leaves, two mats of reeds and rafters of algarobba wood.

Wall Paper

In the olden days of the feudal lords, the walls of their castles were hung with rich embroideries and handsomely woven tapestries. These served a double purposes, to decorate the walls and to make the huge, drafty rooms less cold and bleak. For many centuries walls were decorated only with hangings, until finally some clever person thought of imitating these hangings in heavy paper and of using this paper for wall decorations. This was a very successful idea, and in 1790 a wall paper factory was established in the United States. The first wall papers were quite expensive, but they were also very durable. After a great deal of experimenting there were developed cheaper types of wall paper, and since the beginning of the Nineteenth century paper has been in general use for decoration of walls in many countries of the civilized world.

Digging Through the World

A widely accepted theory regarding the earth's make-up is that a solid crust, corresponding to the rind of an orange, encloses a molten interior corresponding to the pulp, says Tit-Bits Magazine. This theory is supported by mining and boring experience which shows the average rise of temperature downwards to be one degree Fahrenheit for every 50 or 60 feet. Thus at 50 miles the temperature must be 4,000 degrees, or far higher than the fusing point of platinum, which melts at 3,080 degrees. The late Lord Kelvin declared that this planet could not maintain its shape unless the supposed crust were 2,500 miles thick, and concluded that the mass of the earth "is on the whole more rigid than a continuous solid globe of glass of the same dimensions."

FIRE INSURANCE

Paying fire insurance premiums always seems like giving away money. You get no return until you have a fire. Then the amount you have paid seems small in comparison with what you receive. Scalping by Indians

The practice of scalping was not common to all the American tribes as is so often supposed. It was confined originally in North America to the territory in the lower St. Lawrence region held by the Iroquoian and Muskhogean tribes and their immediate neighbors. It was absent from New England and much of the Atlantic coast region and was unknown until comparatively recent times throughout the whole interior and the Plains region. It was not found on the Pacific coast, in the Canadian Northwest, the Arctic region, or anywhere south of the United States with the exception of an area in the jungle in South America. Throughout most of America the earlier trophy was the head itself.

Habits of Crayfish

Some crayfish live in the water underground. They burrow up to the top of the ground and build up little "chimneys" or earth pellets around the opening of the borrow. Crayfish make excellent fish bait when their shells are soft following the casting off of the old, outgrown one. Sometimes they damage crops by burrowing up into newly sprouted corn, cotton, etc.

Domestic System of England

The domestic system of England is the name applied to the system of household industry which preceded the factory system. There was little factory work previous to the early Eighteenth century. Industrial projects, particularly textiles, were largely manufactured in the homes under the personal supervision either of the merchant or his deputies. Due to this, hours were variable and wages were unregulated. This resulted in a system known as sweating.

Carry Young in Pouch

The phenomenon of a pouch in which the female carries her young after they are born is peculiar to the group of mammals known as the marsupials. With the exception of the common opossum of the United States and a close relative of tropical America, all the members of this group are confined to Australasia. Besides the kangaroo, the most familiar member, the group includes the wallaroo, several species of wallaby, the wombat, the koala, the Tasmanian wolf and the Tasmanian devil.

Test Strength of Wire Farm Fences

Cornell University Plans to Establish Test Yard on State Property.

By H. W. Riley, Department of Agricultural Engineering, Cornell University. WNU Service.

Of all jobs on the farm, probably chasing stock and repairing fences are the most wasteful and exasperating. Many farmers complain that some fences on the market today are not as durable as old fences. Fences would not break so soon if they were made of heavy, durable wire and were well galvanized. Such fences, however, seem too expensive for many farmers if they are not sure of their durability.

The American society for testing materials has decided to test farm fencing and other galvanized wire products. A test yard will be set up in New York state on property of the college of agriculture. There many samples of farm fences will be exposed to the weather and carefully watched. Before they are erected, these fences will be completely analyzed, and as the years go by a careful record will be kept of the durability of each fence. The best fences will be clearly shown in a few years.

This society has already shown that the durability of steel against rusting is increased when from one-fifth to one quarter per cent of copper is used in the steel. This copper is added to the steel as it lies in a molten pool in the open hearth furnace, and the additional cost is small enough to be disregarded.

Medium Fat Hog Is Best for Family Cuts of Pork

A 225-pound moderately fat hog produces the "family" size cuts of pork, says Prof. R. B. Hinman of the New York State College of Agriculture.

Such hogs, he adds, will yield hams and three-rib shoulders that weigh about sixteen pounds each, bacon strips and loins that weigh from ten to twelve pounds. These cuts, of desirable size to cure and store after smoking, may be cut into satisfactory economical slices or roasts for cooking. Heavier hogs normally produce a greater proportion of lard. They also produce bacon and hams that some families consider too fat.

Good quality, thrifty hogs normally produce the most desirable meat, Professor Hinman says. Precaution should be taken to see that all animals dressed are in a healthy condition.

Ice Needs on Farms

In parts of the country where natural ice suitable for storing is formed it is time to provide for next summer's needs. The Department of Agriculture has estimated that one-half ton of ice per cow will serve the dairyman to cool and hold cream at a safe temperature if delivered two or three times a week. However, if the whole milk is to be cooled the needs will be not less than a ton and a half per cow. These estimates were made presuming that both ice house and cooling tanks are in good condition. If more than 30 per cent of the ice is lost by melting the amount stored will have to be increased accordingly. The average family needs between five and ten tons per season even when the ice is used sparingly.

Trees on Line

Trees standing on a boundary line belong to respective owners of both sides as tenants in common and although it is asserted in one case that when a tree stands on a boundary line the landowner on either side has the right to lop off limbs and roots on his side close to the trunk, yet it has been more recently declared in several other cases that either owner may not destroy the boundary line tree without the other's consent, and if he does the other owner may recover damages against him. The adjoining landowner would have no jurisdiction over any tree not on the line nor on his own land.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Mud in Your Eye

By FRANK L. PARKE

HE HAD, Jud Draper decided amiably, more things to be grateful for than any other young man in America. He was grateful to the hospital authorities for releasing him into the world on such a May morning. When the deep coat of mud which roofed the walk was all there was left of winter.

He was grateful, too, to the city fathers. For having foreseen the mud. And at the first sign of spring having stretched out rods of stout, wide boards to outwit it. He was grateful finally, to the doctor. For having taken some fourteen odd scraps of bone in a bag of twisted flesh and having made of them something a hundred and eighty pound of man could move about on. And for meeting any and all situations with the liberally and unclassifiably accented announcement that "We moost approshe this busy-ness of leeving with coo-rash, with deeg-neety an' with hu-more!"

Which was, Jud was beginning to believe, not a formula to be sneezed at. As he made the turn by Washington's statue he made out in his mind a list of items to be treated by the doctor's nostrums. First he would have to get that leg into serviceable shape. Then he would have to see what handsprings his office had taken in his absence.

And then he saw the girl.
